A New and Attractive Profit Sharing Bond Issue

We recently advertised in THE CONTINENT certain profit sharing certificates secured on First Mortgages on Idaho Farm and City Property, and sold a considerable number of them to CONTINENT readers. These certificates were sold at a premium of from $3.00 to $15.00 on $100, and are paying 10% on their par value, 8% interest and 2% profit. These certificates cannot be purchased from the company at any price at this time, but in lieu thereof we are offering a bond issue based on the same principle.

A bit of landscape on one of our fertile Idaho Farms

This bond issue is for $100,000 and the bonds can be purchased in amounts of $100, $500 or $1000, and will be due ten years from date. They bear interest at the rate of seven per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, and in addition to this will share in the profits of the company to such an extent as the Board of Directors may deem desirable.

These Bonds Are Secured by Mortgages

on farms such as shown in the illustration above, and on city property, and the mortgages [illegible] with the Pacific National Bank of Boise, which bank has a capital and surplus of $415,000. There will be no premium on these bonds prior to August 1, 1913. An investment in these bonds is better than any investment in real estate because you have less than 50% of the cash value of real estate invested, and the increase in the value of bonds would be much greater than the increase in real estate values.

1205 Springfield av

Should any of our bond holders desire to have the mortgages in their own possession, we will at any time exchange bonds for mortgages.

Around the Shop

Down in an Ohio city the preacher has been emphasizing the advisability of getting to church early. At least the Around-the-Shop Man presumes so. Being disposed always to give credit to the minister, he is inclined to think that the newspaper printing the following paragraph had not gone into the matter fully:

"A light in the Presbyterian church at 3 o'clock Thursday morning caused near-by residents to send for the police, thinking a burglar had entered the edifice. Five officers, armed to the teeth, hurried to the scene, only to be given the laugh by a piano tuner, who said he had several jobs ahead and wanted to get a good start for the day."

However, it's a comparatively simple matter to get to church early—if one starts at the right time. You remember the married daughter who received a telegram from her mother:

"Missed train. Will start same time tomorrow."

And who promptly wired:

"If you start same time won't you miss train again?"

Speaking of starting early, however, it takes a Missouri Presbyterian to establish the record:

"Inclosed find $2.50 for The Continent to be sent to my month-old grandson, whose mother passed away the day he was born. I hope to have him enter the Presbyterian ministry and want to begin his training young. His papa can read to him when older. Send to Master H. B. M., Jr., ———, Texas."

By the way, is the home reading you provide for your children likely to turn their thoughts to religious subjects—perhaps to the ministry? Why not establish a positive influence in your home from the beginning—and encourage your neighbor to do so? Isn't a subscription for the new home a good wedding gift?

Apostates from Freedom

AT THIS one hundred and thirty-seventh anniversary of the Declaration of Independence—wherein the forefathers of the republic claimed liberty as an inalienable human right—no reflection can be to the contemporary American more significant than a frank facing of this radical contrast between then and now:

NOBODY BELIEVES IN LIBERTY ANY MORE.

This diametric difference between the men who created and the men who now inhabit the United States of America is doubtless apprehended by few of its present citizens. The original forms of government for the nation continue unchanged, and the old watchwords of the fathers are still repeated year by year in patriotic tradition.

But thought that gets back of the appearances and names of things discovers the widest possible fundamental change in the attitude of Americans toward axioms on which the leaders of the Continental Congress in 1776 staked their statesmanship—their lives, indeed.

These revolutionary patriots believed it a necessary law of civilized society that men tend to grow better as they are thrown more and more on their own individual responsibility and educated to judge intelligently the issues of life for themselves.

But today nobody shares their faith.

The socialists think that the free development of society has produced intolerable evils.

Labor unionists evince but trifling confidence in the progress of their cause through voluntary adherence of those whom conviction draws to the support of it.

The Industrial Workers of the World and the anarchist groups, though they loudly invoke the name of liberty, unabashedly threaten with force those who will not consent to what it pleases their own fancy to require.

And over against these agitating and innovating forces the great conservative forces of the commonwealth likewise renounce the time-honored faith of freedom and vow that the liberty of the social radical must be quickly curtailed or the whole country will come to ruin.

In this panic of distrust and dread, descendants of the revolutionary fathers of 1776 are ready to sanction restrictions of freedom in writing and speech which to those patriots would have been unthinkable.

So all in all, it is but fair to say that the whole nation is together apostate from the doctrines of liberty deemed indisputable in the time of the Declaration of Independence.

It is vain to deny that something has gone wrong in the republic since the fathers fell asleep. In a serious degree their theories of society have failed to work common good.

New elements added by way of correction must undoubtedly be sought.

But The Continent records its profound conviction that the fathers were not wrong in the large principle of their faith in liberty.

Their belief in the wholesomeness of freedom was essentially a profound trust in the ultimate coming right of the average man. And that trust Christianity justifies and fortifies with its own view of the overruling wisdom of God. God works through the average man.

Not abandoning, then, but more than ever laying hold upon, the fundamental right of the human soul to mold its own destiny, the twentieth century American republic should meet its problems, not by cramping liberty, but by enlarging its endeavors to train its citizens mentally and morally for the responsibilities of freemen.

Preserve, defend, the freedom of the individual; emphasize, develop, energize, the training of the individual—this is the statesmanship which promises safety for America.

President of France Visits England

Astute students of international relations have viewed with interest the visit of M. Poincare, president of France, to England, which ended last week. Coming so soon after the visit of King George to his relative, the kaiser of Germany, this visit of the head of the French republic carries additional significance. As The New York Tribune points out, France has been at peace with all the nations of Europe for forty-two years, the longest period in her history. Spasmodically ever since the Norman conquest France and England have been at war with each other seemingly with hearty unanimity. In 800 years they had twenty-four separate wars, with an aggregate duration of 225 years, and on one occasion during two centuries they were at war for 122 years at a stretch, with two intermissions of eight and two years respectively. After such a record the heads of the two nations can well afford to exchange felicitations and express the mutual hope that their present relations will be long continued. Genuine approval of the visit seemed evident on the part of the people of both nations. The French parliament voted $57,000 for the president's expenses, and the French people were evidently as much gratified at the cordial reception given their president by the English as the Britishers were happy in extending hospitality. The president on his arrival in England passed in review a notable gathering of modern British war vessels and was met at the dock by the Prince of Wales, who represented the king. King George met his distinguished guest at the railway station in London and escorted him through the lavishly decorated streets lined with regiments of guards to the house which was placed at his disposal during his visit.

A delicate compliment was paid by the guests at a banquet in Buckingham palace, when French was spoken throughout the meal. The famous service of gold plate worth $5,000,000 was taken from Windsor castle for use on this occasion.

Circumstantial Story of Lobbying Is Told

A sensational and pointed turn to the so-called lobby investigation has been given by detailed charges made by Colonel Martin M. Mulhall, whose revelations were published at considerable length in New York and Chicago newspapers on Sunday and were followed by subsequent allegations and denials. Colonel Mulhall, who was in the employ of the National Association of Manufacturers at a reputed salary of $5,000 a year and $20,000 annual "expenses" as legislative agent or lobbyist, asserts that the relations existing between his organization and members of Congress were improper and in many instances grossly corrupt. He names several members of Congress who received gifts of money for themselves or for their campaign funds.

The charges have been taken up by the senate's special investigating committee, headed by Senator Overman. This committee has already succeeded in letting in a flood of daylight on the operations of the various lobbyists denounced by President Wilson. Ex-Judge Robert S. Lovett, chairman of the board of directors of the Union Pacific Railway Company, told the senate committee last week that a long continued and determined effort had been made to have a certain New York corporation lawyer retained to prevent unpleasant agitation in congress against the dissolution plans of the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific railway systems. According to Mr. Lovett, a congressman and also a leading banker had urged that the employment of this lawyer, Edward Lauterbach, might "smooth away" difficulties in Congress. But the story told by Colonel Mulhall is of a far more spectacular nature and covered operations which he said began in 1904. James A. Emery, counsel for the manufacturers' association, was prompt to discredit the Mulhall charges, as were Representative McDermott of Chicago and Representatives Sherley of Kentucky, Bartholdt of Missouri and Gardner of New Jersey, also former representatives from Maryland and Illinois and a former postmaster general. Just how much of substance and how much of unjustifiable inference and loose talk there is in Colonel Mulhall's expose will probably be determined by the senate investigating committee.

New Currency Plan Before Congress

Congress seems to have taken in good spirit the energetic request of President Wilson delivered to them personally that they act during this summer on a new currency bill. This measure, the Glass-Owen bill, named for the chairmen of the appropriate committees of both houses, was introduced last week. It was modified in four particulars, however, from the bill as proposed ten days ago. These changes were made at the suggestion of members of the American Bankers' Association. This measure somewhat resembles the bill much discussed a year ago and commonly called the Aldrich currency measure. This in turn was founded upon the investigations of the national monetary commission, which conducted extensive inquiries into the whole subject of banking and currency of this country. The bill would establish a system of reserve banks modeled after the federal system of government, whereby the additional currency in times of stress is to be controlled by a group of men appointed by the President, called the federal reserve board. Under the Aldrich plan the corresponding board was to be under the control of the banking interests. It was this phase that aroused great opposition throughout the country.

The new measure, which has President Wilson's strong support, puts this board, which will be the actual controlling factor in the currency situation, in the hands of the government. The bill provides for the retirement of the present bond-secured currency and the substitution for it of new federal "reserve notes" in addition to the authorization of a large amount of emergency currency based upon current assets of banks. The reserve notes will be secured by gold or lawful money reserve in the vaults of the federal reserve banks equal to one-third of the total amount of notes issued. The currency will in addition be a first lien upon all the assets of the reserve banks, and on top of this is a government guaranty. The measure as proposed is acknowledged by friends of the administration to be tentative so far as details go, although it is evident that the President intends to insist upon federal control of the reserve board, the key to the whole situation. Students of banking have long looked for some such relief as is proposed, and it is hoped that this measure will greatly aid in checking panics caused by shortage of the medium of exchange.

Illinois Suffrage Leaders Plan Campaign

The way in which the women who have been trying to induce the Illinois state legislature to grant limited suffrage to them arranged the final details of their struggle will appeal to every thrifty soul. After Governor Dunne had announced that he would approve the measure, in spite of all the efforts of vested interests of the state to induce him to veto it, the women arranged with a moving-picture concern for the right to take pictures of the governor as he signed this historic document. The women thus received $5,000, which will be used by them in an educational propaganda before the next general election. Guarded statements made by some of the newspaper correspondents at Springfield show that the pressure put upon the governor was greater than that exerted in connection with any other bill this winter. The governor's signature makes Illinois the first state east of the Mississippi to grant woman suffrage. Although the women cannot have the general right to vote under the present state constitution, they may vote at presidential and municipal elections and on all special propositions.

Boys Race Across Half the Continent

One of the most interesting athletic events which have taken place in America recently was that in which hundreds of Boy Scouts carried a message from President Wilson at the White House to Mayor Harrison of Chicago. The latter received it at the opening of the international athletic contest in Grant Park, which began last Saturday. Running day and night, this series of youthful athletes carried the packet over mountain and valley between the two cities. The average distance for the runners was a mile and the boys were accompanied by automobiles to see that they did not overtax themselves. In several instances, however, the boys exceeded the schedule set and arrived at the end of their allotted distance only to find that they had come before the relief was ready to proceed.

Labor Has Difficulties in Many Places

A racial and labor dispute of some citizens of the small town of Hemet in the Perris valley of California a week ago did not make matters any more pleasant for the administration in negotiations with Japan with reference to the rather involved situation in regard to the relation of Japanese citizens to America. A group of Korean fruit pickers were met as they got off a train at Hemet and were ordered to return to the train and get out of town. Ranchers had hired the foreigners to pick apricots, as no other labor was available.

Similar drastic action was taken about the same time against an entirely different class of people at Marshfield, Oregon, where two leaders of the Industrial Workers of the World were driven out of town, with warnings not to return.

The unrest of labor in other parts of the country is typified in the cessation of work on a number of large buildings in Chicago, where the contractors ordered a lockout after a long continued strike on one building, the basis of which was a dispute over the preparation of marble for the Chicago building in Georgia. Eleven thousand garment workers in Cincinnati obeyed an order to strike, the grievance being small pay. The same city is suffering from a strike of the drivers of ice wagons. Coal miners in the New River field of West Virginia were ordered out July 1. It is said that this order will affect 15,000 workers, and conditions in neighboring coal fields are uncertain.

Medical Men Warn Against Alcohol

One of the strongest pronouncements recently made by a group of physicians in regard to liquor drinking was that embodied in a series of resolutions adopted by a congress of alienists and neurologists, which recently met in Chicago under the auspices of the Chicago Medical Society. These physicians, who have made a long study of nervous energy and its relation to man's efficiency, recommended that the railroads of the country adopt a universal rule requiring all employees to abstain from using alcoholic beverages on duty or off duty. They further said that the habitual use of any narcotic should be ground for discharge. If the railroads follow the recommendations of these experts they also will devise some plan whereby the mental integrity of all men engaged in the operation of trains will be systematically examined for the purpose of eliminating those who may be mentally unfit. Dr. Henry A. Cotton of Trenton, N. J., said that every drop of beer destroys a nerve cell.

Free vaccination against typhoid fever was offered recently by the Chicago health department to the first thousand persons who applied. Similar inoculation is compulsory in the army and navy, where it has reduced this disease to a minimum. Warnings have been sent out generally for people on vacation to watch carefully the source from which their drinking water comes as a simple means of preventing typhoid.

To Make Tax-Dodgers Do Their Duty

Why officials whose duty it is to deal with laws will themselves ignore important statutes is hard to understand—almost as hard as to comprehend why men who are beneficiaries of orderly, law-governed society will evade or avoid statutory requirements. A case very much in point is the matter of personal property taxes, which are intermittently discussed by newspapers all over the country. In Chicago the fact has lately been disclosed that sixteen judges of the municipal court, several aldermen and a large number of bankers and prominent business and professional men, including university professors, had filed no tax schedules as the law provides. As a result—practically for the first time—the board of assessors has been penalizing these negligent gentlemen by adding 50 per cent to their personal tax assessments, which in the absence of a voluntary schedule the assessors are at liberty to estimate.

The whole subject of taxation on private and corporate wealth is said to be one which Christian men should grapple with in order to free it from all color of partisanship, dishonesty and unfairness. The prospective federal income tax is a decided step in this direction, but the proposed $3,000 or $4,000 exemption is so high that it will not be universally distributed.

To Prevent a Recurrence of Ohio Floods

Representative Bartholdt and Senator Newlands have introduced bills in Congress setting aside $60,000,000 yearly for building and maintaining a system of storage reservoirs at the sources of the rivers of the United States. At the headwaters of the Ohio and its tributaries and at points along their courses $10,000,000 is to be applied, and a corresponding sum for the Mississippi valley. The National Reclamation Association is one of the sponsors for the proposed legislation, which is to be pressed at the next session in the hope of obtaining effective action and practical results before next spring.

Great Presbyterian Benefactor Dies Suddenly

A tremendous blow to the Presbyterian Church, and particularly to its missionary and educational interests, befalls the denomination in the death of Louis H. Severance of Cleveland. The news of his decease is the more staggering because no warning of it had gone before. It was obvious, of course—considerably more than seventy years from his birth—that Mr. Severance had come to an age when his remaining lease of life could not be many years extended, but his whole personality so radiated the impressions of health and vigor that it was next to impossible to think of him as a man of age. Even his snow-white hair and beard failed to contradict the youthfulness of his sparkling eyes. Nevertheless, some lurking constitutional weakness made him victim to what first appeared to be no serious illness.

Louis H. Severance

Though Mr. Severance still retained his membership and eldership in Woodland Avenue church at Cleveland, he had in recent years resided most of the time in New York City. And having abandoned the business connections with the Standard Oil Company whereby he had accumulated his fortune, Mr. Severance devoted practically his entire time thenceforth to the business of his church's Boards of Foreign Missions and of Colleges. In both of these he was the most active lay member, and an invaluable aid to the executive secretaries of both. To the interests under the care of each Mr. Severance gave lavishly, yet with such reticence that few appreciated the proportions of his generosity.

In the past year, for example, his gifts to Presbyterian colleges through the College Board totaled $190,000, and this sum does not include anything for Wooster University of Ohio, of which he was the chief benefactor—indeed, in its newer equipment, almost the creator. By no means all of Mr. Severance's Wooster benefactions are known to the public, but the total was certainly no less than half a million dollars. His particular pride there lay in the Severance Mission School, which he endowed, but that represented only a small fraction of the aid which he lent to Ohio Synod's great educational center.

Mr. Severance was, however, more than a giver. He had served on uncounted committees for the elaboration of progressive church policies and the solution of troublesome church questions, and everywhere his sound judgment had carried exceptional weight and had frequently proved decisive of issues in hand. In his last meeting with the Board of Foreign Missions on June 16 his clear and firm grasp of practical questions of mission administration was strikingly evident in the earnest arguments by which he supported his views. Mr. Severance had doubtless traveled more widely over Presbyterian mission fields and had inquired more particularly into foreign mission problems than any other American layman of his generation, and in a wonderfully retentive memory held distinct the problems of each station that he had visited. He was peculiarly interested in Nanking, China, and devoted time and attention without stint to the interdenominational missionary university arising in that city, of whose board of trustees he was chairman.

Immediately following the Foreign Board meeting just referred to Mr. Severance left New York for Ohio to attend the commencement of Wooster University. All through commencement week there he was his characteristically genial and joyful self. Returning from Wooster to Cleveland still in the best of health, he stopped to visit there his son and daughter, John L. Severance and Mrs. Dudley Allen. At noon on Saturday, June 21, he was suddenly taken with acute intestinal pains, which proved beyond the power of physicians to control.

South Africa Responds to Smith and Robins

In several important "round the world" tours of evangelistic leaders in the last few years South Africa has been consistently passed by. The people of that region were therefore exceptionally eager to welcome Fred B. Smith and Raymond Robins in their Men and Religion tour. In Durban, Pietermaritzburg and Cape Town the reception of the visitors was specially enthusiastic. The Daily Mercury of Durban, in which city the visitors began their South African work, declares that the audience which crowded the town hall to hear Mr. Robins speak on "The City We Live In" left at the close of the address wishing that the meeting could have lasted an hour or two longer.

Mr. Smith faced a remarkably representative gathering of the business and professional men of the city in Wesley hall, and impressed them unforgettably with his insistence that they were responsible above all others for the moral character of their community. The quartet which travels with these Men and Religion speakers was as popular in South Africa as in Australia, and added much to the public impression of the meetings.

Exceptional Moderatorial Election in Australia

Australian Presbyterianism has two General Assembly seasons in the course of a year. The Federal Assembly, including the whole of Australia and Tasmania, meets in October, but the separate provincial bodies in the different sections of Australia are also called General Assemblies, and these meet in May.

The most important of these provincial bodies is the General Assembly of New South Wales, which meets in Sydney. Its custom is to elect a moderator through presbyterial voting in advance of convening the sessions. But this year, out of four nominees voted for in the presbyteries none received a majority, and it was left for the commissioners to elect at the end of the retiring moderator's sermon. The election was unanimous after all, however, for the three men who had fallen to the rear in the presbyteries agreed to join in nominating the "high man," and in consequence Rev. Alexander Smith of East Maitland was chosen without a contest. But the unusual circumstances compelled the moderator to violate a custom unbroken for twenty years. Being without previous assurance of his election, he was obliged to preside over the Assembly in ordinary clerical dress, not having had opportunity to provide the moderatorial court costume which his predecessors have all affected. Neither was he able to deliver the moderator's usual inaugural oration.

The Assembly's evangelistic committee came first among agencies reporting, and it told the Assembly that its functions had for the time being been practically superseded by the Chapman-Alexander campaigns. While it could not be said that the report was unfriendly to the evangelists, it did contain this sentence: "We feel that it is the opinion of our church that more lasting results are obtained by the quieter work done in and by each local church than by any special spurt of evangelistic zeal."

Sydney papers, discussing the Assembly, noted that there was far less controversy in its sessions than is ordinarily to be expected of Scotch-blooded Presbyterians, but a sharp debate did occur over the question whether members of the church at public elections should be advised to vote "no license" or simply to vote "against the liquor traffic." On the main theme, however, there was unanimity, and a solid vote in favor of the clause: "The Assembly reaffirms its opinion that the whole liquor traffic should be entirely abolished from the state." The unqualified indorsement of this proposition was regarded as a great advance from a few years ago, when the temperance committee's report was looked upon as something of a joke.

More significant than all else in the Assembly's procedure, however, was its action in regard to Christian education and social service. It determined to bend the whole force of the denomination to developing and improving Sabbath schools, and to that end provision was made for the appointment of a denominational director of religious education. Plans were also set afoot to develop in connection with other churches a scheme of Australian graded lessons. The subject of social service was handled by the committee on public morals, which presented a voluminous report compiled from answers received from all parts of the province on the relations of the church and the nonchurch-going classes, as well as the relations of employers and employees. This will be published in permanent form. The Australians believe it a contribution of international importance to social service literature.

The Western Australia Assembly devoted most of its attention to home mission problems, including missions both to white settlers in newly occupied districts and to the uncivilized native races. At Brisbane the Queensland Assembly discussed with more seriousness than all else the inroads of Sabbath desecration in that province.

Editorial

An Unavoidable Question

THIS is a story of a church which is not Presbyterian but which is typical of more churches than itself. No matter what the denomination is just now. The church is located in the country, two miles from a village. It consists of twenty-five members. Within gunshot of it is another church of a few more members. In the village are two more churches. These four are not far different in their beliefs. Each has a house of worship, each has at least a small manse, each maintains as full a roster of services and societies as a membership under 100 in each case will permit.

To the church of which we are specially thinking there came a year ago a young man from the seminary of his denomination. He had spent seven years in direct preparation for his work. Then he accepted this call. His salary is $300. The mission board of his church gives him one-third of it, which he receives regularly. The other $200 he is supposed to receive from his church, but they find the amount very burdensome in view of the expense of keeping up the buildings. He receives it with great irregularity, therefore; but by living alone in the manse with his dog, doing his own cooking and visiting around among the people, he has managed to live through a year. At no time do his congregations number fifty people, and, as is always the case with a small body, they are much set on having everything done in the way which they approve. The young man does not complain. The saddest part of it all is that he takes it somewhat as a matter of course. This is not overdrawn at any single point, and is an accurate description of a situation in one of our well settled central states.

For men who love the kingdom of God, and who believe in its advance, the unavoidable question is whether this can be right. Has any denomination a right to take a young man who is needed in the work of the kingdom and set him at such tasks as this? Has any handful of Christians a right to assert its testimony in such arrogant terms as this? Has any mission board a right to spend its money in such a case? Has any young man a right to spend his life at such work? Remember, it is not a Presbyterian church. It is a church of a denomination which is divided into even pettier divisions than have ever marked us. But it opens the question whether the testimony which a church is to bear shall be to some divisive detail, or to the great conquering gospel of Christ.

Valuing Beecher in His Centennial Year

Our live neighbor in the field of church journalism—The Congregationalist—has distinguished itself with a Beecher centenary number which is by all odds the most satisfactory and illuminating tribute to the great Brooklynite that has appeared anywhere in commemoration of the hundredth anniversary of his birth. A varied collection of informal personal tributes from men and women who knew him give a more vivid picture of the mighty preacher than could possibly be derived from labored literary essays of "appreciation." It is, of course, appropriate for Congregationalists to take special pride in Beecher. Yet Presbyterians need not forget that he was theirs also. The "greatest preacher of the nineteenth century" —and more and more it is apparent that Beecher, by common opinion of Christendom, is to be confirmed in that mount of historic distinction—came to the discovery of himself and was discovered by the people when he was pastor of the old Second Presbyterian church of Indianapolis from 1839 to 1847. But, of course, except for pleasantly indulging an innocent pride of association, no particular body of Christians has right to lay claim to Beecher. He was preeminently among the men of his time a catholic spirit, careless of ecclesiastical tags and forms. In a high sense he belonged to all the churches that taught God's love to men.

In his own day, indeed, that strenuous emphasis of his on the love of God sounded like heresy to stalwart theologians who feared some undervaluation of Christ's atonement. But that worry has long since disappeared. It is now apparent that Beecher subtracted nothing from but added much to the working theology of American religion. Even his Olympian voice could not be a whole orchestra of truth, but it added a needful note to make the symphony of Christian faith in this country far more complete than it had been before. And he rendered it forever impossible that any later minister of Jesus should be accused of exaggerating the Father's love! The only ill effect which could in any case be justly feared from such a viewpoint as his—the danger of weakening down a great infinite moral love to an indolent and nerveless complacency—never found place in Beecher's thought or life. He never dulled the edge of discernment which perceives that God's love is no extenuation for sin.

It is true, that when a cloud of slander overspread his life in later years many were constrained to wonder whether Beecher had lost in his admiration of God's goodness the guiding star of God's moral law. But today, at the centenary of his birth, it is a glad thing to see that the character of the man has risen above that cloud. There is no discernible suspicion of him left. A remarkably solid consensus of public feeling acquits him of having ever fallen from the grace that should be in a minister of Christ's gospel. He was the victim of hysterical accusations which smirched externally a character in fact unstained, and the smirch is now gone forever—such today seems sure to be the verdict of impartial history.

All Americans should give thanks that this is so. Beecher would have to be acknowledged great, even though he were guilty. But innocent, he can be loved still and lauded as he was in his life. And inspiring figure that he was both as patriot and as church man, patriots and church men may continue to point their sons to him as a high example of what a man may be whose life is wholly given to his country, his fellow men and his God.

New Data Promised on Sabbath Values

The New York Sabbath committee is moving up to "fill a long-felt want." It is a want that has been felt by every minister or teacher or public-spirited citizen who has undertaken to inculcate in individuals or communities a sense of the importance of the Sabbath—want of authoritative data abreast of the times to tell why the Sabbath is necessary to man physically and mentally and spiritually and socially. There is a good deal of fugitive stuff on, these topics floating about in the newspapers, but nobody knows where it comes from, and much of it is as old as the much worn story about the California wagon emigrants of sixty years ago who by resting on Sundays got across to the coast a month ahead of the travelers who drove Sundays just the same as weekdays. Certainly to the modern American it sounds like poor argument to bring up a tale as ancient as that, but there is mighty little available literature on the subject that is much more recent.

But now the New York Sabbath committee has determined that there is going to be something more satisfactory on hand for those who need ammunition in this service. The committee has instructed its secretary, Dr. William P. Swartz, to institute a "scientific research into the influence of the Sabbath on human welfare" just as soon as funds can be supplied to meet the cost of it. Already a beginning has been made, for Professor William J. Gies, who occupies the chair of biological chemistry in the medical school of Columbia University, has been engaged to direct the investigation into the influence of the Sabbath on the physical well-being of the race. Dr. Gies is going into the matter with heart and soul of interest, and no doubt before many months will have worked out something more serviceable as a Sabbath rest argument than the emigrant train story. In like manner other experts as able and convincing will study how "a Sabbath well spent" helps mental efficiency, business success and home cheer.

Dr. Swartz is preeminently right in insisting that the present-day problem of Sabbath observance is not going to be met by pointing to restrictive acts on the statute book—the acts so often sneered at as "blue laws"—and rudely reviling the masses for not obeying their prohibitions. That is not after the manner or spirit of Christ. He said, "The Sabbath was made for man," and if his followers in the twentieth century expect to maintain the day as either a day of worship or a day of rest, they must demonstrate to the people the concrete truth of the Lord's saying. There must be steady, patient education to show the people how and wherein the Sabbath is for their benefit. And that is the viewpoint from which this progressive committee is starting out to provide the proof.

Evil Impressions Born of Church Disunion

It is indeed depressing to think that some of the arguments urged against church union in the Canadian General Assembly's late debate on the proposed merger with Methodism and Congregationalism can be the product of Presbyterian minds. The pleasant thing to believe is that Presbyterian spirit makes for comprehensive views of Christian relations as well as other subjects. Certainly The Continent likes to cultivate self-respect in the broadminded laity of the church by maintaining that in the Presbyterian fellowship denominational consciousness is not sectarian feeling. But among the champions of the opposition in the Canadian Assembly sectarianism was odious. The principal antiunion speaker declared that in case of voting for union the Assembly's session would become the funeral service of the Presbyterian Church, and his seconder referred to the unionists as persons disloyally aiming to blot out their own fellowship. To be sure, the Assembly stamped its disapprobation on such selfish talk by a vote of 251 to 75, but it is bitter to realize that there were even seventy-five persons in a Presbyterian church court to whom talk of this kind had sounded Christian. It is bitterer still to know, from votes already taken on the subject, that in a Canadian Methodist body of equal rank the minority would not have been nearly so large.

But the incident is instructive because it reveals the snare that inheres in denominational conditions even where the leaders of a church are laboring with all sincerity to keep down sectarian pride and to cultivate the spirit of cooperation with other communions. Say all that one will, in sober earnest or sentimental extravagance, about the denominations being simply different regiments of one army, the mass of the people don't think of it so. They see the churches separately organized and differently named, and nothing on earth can keep the average church man from looking on them as so many separate bodies of independent existence. The sad result is that when it is proposed to combine two or more of these bodies into one, it is only the few who see that fragments of one thing are being matched together to produce a whole; the many declare that the old entities are being destroyed, wiped out, killed off, in order to make room for some new thing never in existence before. The theory that a "realizing sense" of Christian unity can be created among the church quite as well without as with an external union is a fallacy with which sensible men cannot afford to delude themselves. As a plain matter of fact, our denominationalism never under the best conditions works that way. Unity gains what it does gain not by denominations but in spite of them.

But it is unfair to our Canadian friends to dwell on the embarrassments which their sectarian minority is causing them. Certainly the majority continues to bear itself with marvelous patience. In an equable temper, which is beyond all praise, it persists in its purpose to exalt the undivided interests of the kingdom of God, while still laboring with truly Christian delicacy to make an easy path into union for the palsied knees of even the lamest sectarians. And meanwhile the church goes on efficiently and prosperously, blessed in its prevailing generous spirit even though yet retarded from this one particular aspiration. The high and aggressive life pervading the denomination was thrillingly demonstrated in the church congress preceding the Assembly, and the missionary fervor of the Assembly itself was another infallible token of living spirit. It was certainly befitting that such an Assembly should have been presided over by such a warhorse of missions as Dr. Murdoch Mackenzie, the "hero" of Honan.

Validating a Once Unvalued Calling

The announcement that Dr. Elmer A. Bess of Clinton, Iowa, has resigned his church in order to become pastor of Presbyterian students in the University of Iowa is a matter of big significance. It has not been a lapse of time too long to remember since Presbyterian pastors were politely dubious—and some several shades worse than that—about this whole proposal for pastoring young folks misguided enough (as it was then considered) to attend state university. Afterwards followed a period when with more or less grudging it was gingerly conceded that there might be in these state university pastorates some sort of transient job for a few young men not yet outfitted for big work in the church. But now opens a third period, when in a great vigorous synod a foremost pastor, notable for his ministerial success, the chairman of his synod's executive commission, a preacher in the very prime of his powers, leaves a big congregation in a thriving city and goes to become pastor of students. The hour of supercilious and superficial mistrust of the work has gone by; its inherent importance is certified and settled in the only way that could be decisive—a conspicuous man has taken hold of it at a cost of temporal sacrifice.

The value of Dr. Bess's action is not at all summed up in what he may be expected to do at Iowa City; it includes also the permanent elevation of this sort of ministry to its rightful level on a par with the highest obligations of the church. For assuredly all men who see the world without glamour of worldly interest to slant their vision must finally perceive that no congregation of mature men and women, though the most brilliant and famous in the land, can afford an opportunity for religious influence which in any manner equals the possibilities open to him who deals with a company of young men or young women in college.

World-Neighborhood; World-Brotherhood

BY J. A. MACDONALD

[Extract from an address delivered by Dr. Macdonald at the recent convention of Associated Advertising Clubs at Baltimore]

LIFE is either a neighborhood or a jungle or the confused and uncertain middle ground between. The rule of the jungle is, "He shall take who has the power, and he shall keep who can"; the law of the neighborhood is, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Justice at its highest in the jungle is, "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth"; "Avenge not thyself" is law in the neighborhood, and "Whosoever would smite thee on the one cheek, turn to him the other also." Greatness in the jungle is in lording it over others; the maxim of the neighborhood is, "If any among you would be great, let him be your servant."

The neighborhood and the jungle through the ages, spirit against spirit, ideal against ideal, are locked in struggle. The whole history of civilization, the splendor of its achievements and the tragic desolation of its catastrophes, might be written in terms of that age-long struggle. All that is best in politics, all that is worthiest in trade, all that is most enduring in social progress and all that is most vital in religion work together for the reclaiming of the jungle and bringing it into obedience to the law of the neighborhood. The long hope of the world is in the triumph of that law. The prophetic dream of the undivided church is of the transformed jungle of life.

But the international area is as yet half jungle. The law that civilized clans and classes into ordered society and organized districts and cities into states and nations stops short, its work half done, at the international boundary. Officially, most nations count most other nations their enemies. They live in suspense and fear. They maintain huge and costly defenses, fortifications, armies, navies, and their allied parasites, which mean a burdensome tax on every productive industry and a blight and curse on modern civilization. America alone, of all the continents, can show the world an international boundary line between two high-strung and proud people that over its 4,000 miles is a civilized neighborhood swept clear of the jungle marks of battlements and warships and guns and sentinels on guard. When the half-barbaric remainders of life on other continents are civilized by the neighborhood idea, the example of the United States and Canada will be followed by all the world.

The fact of world-neighborhood suggests world-brotherhood. It requires it. Indeed it begins strongly to demand it. All great interests of any one nation are world interests. All great ideas are world ideas. All great sentiments are world sentiments. The real forces of civilization the world over are gathering together into one irrepressible demand that war shall cease.

* * * * *

Back of all world interests, giving heat and potency to world ideas, the great world sentiments glow and burn. Their light and heat go through the nations. They are the dynamic of world movements. By them valleys are exalted, mountains are made low, the crooked is made straight and rough places plain. The divine sentiment, the compelling emotion, the deathless passion incarnated in the Nazarene changed all history. From the hilltop of the ages he caught the vision of the world and all the wonder that would be. He saw the jungle driven back, its rule of force crowded out by the law of love. "E'en the serpent that slid away silent, he felt the new law." In that world vision was the world-neighborhood. To make that dream come true he said, "Go ye into all the world." They went. They still go—they and we and all of us. Though the vision tarry, it shall not fail.

Hymn of Consecration to the Cause of Social Justice

BY CHARLES E. PERKINS

STUDENTS of Christian hymnology have frequently expressed regret that the church's hymns of service are nearly all in the imagery of war, and that in consequence the social note which dominates so completely the thinking of progressive twentieth century Christians is scarcely heard at all in the musical worship of the church. A number of eminent writers—Professor Rauschenbusch perhaps foremost among them—have voiced the hope that social inspiration would soon produce a new sort of Christian hymns. The influence of that suggestion is plainly traceable in the hymn following, which it is suggested would be especially appropriate to be sung when young men and women join the church on profession of faith.

Jesus' road lies plain before thee;
  Mark the goal to which it tends,
And its Golden Law of Labor—
  Honest work for Righteous ends.
Hides a threat of social hardship
  In thy future's cherished plan?
Do not seek to build thy fortune
  On the wrongs of fellow man.

From the toiling world around you
  There ascends a bitter cry;
Woman's sobs and childhood's wailings
  Blend with manhood's hopeless sigh.
High the fabric of earth's riches
  Rears itself on every side;
Yet how oft must they who build it
  In distress and want abide!

If they shall not bend forever
  'Neath their crushing load of wrong;
If, for agony of ages,
  In their hearts shall rise a song;
If the era of the people,
  Dawning now, to power shall grow—
Men of heart and faith, enlisting,
  Ancient wrongs must overthrow.

Be it thine, in life's fair morning,
  When the daring sense of might Thrills and stirs, to be a champion
  For the cause of social right.
Christ appoints for those who love him
  Tasks for hand and brain and heart,
In the making strong his kingdom.
  Rouse thee, then, and do thy part!

The Pastor Spoiled Her Prayers

A denominational official now in service in an eastern city recalls with zest an edifying story from his pastoral experience years ago. One day he went to a wealthy lady in his congregation to urge her to furnish $125 needed for some local charity in which the pastor was interested. The lady was frankly not as much noted for her generosity as for her wealth, and she demurred seriously to this request. Finally the pastor said: "Well, sister, you pray over the matter this week, and if on Sunday you still feel that you should not give this money, just tell me so and I will not say anything more to you about it." The pastor relates that on the next Sabbath he opened his eyes after the benediction to see this good parishioner rushing frantically toward the pulpit, with a roll of bills in her outstretched hand. "Here," she cried, as she thrust the money into his grasp; "take your old money. I haven't been able to enjoy my prayers all the week."

Getting En Rapport with His Audience

Perhaps you have heard this before—anyway, here it is:

The lieutenant governor of a western state is an exceedingly nervous man. In course of duty it became necessary for him to visit the state penitentiary. The warden gathered up his flock to listen to a brief address by the official, who had not prepared himself for anything of that sort and was plainly embarrassed. Then he gathered himself up and began:

"My fellow citizens——"

That did not sound quite right and he made another dash.

"My fellow convicts——"

The prisoners began to grin and the speaker did the same and broke loose again:

"Well, I don't know exactly how to address you, boys, but I'm mighty glad to see so many of you here——"

The palm for brevity probably should be awarded to a marine who testified about the explosion of a gun on a war vessel. The marine testified at a hearing after he had passed some months in the hospital being patched up after the accident. "Please give your version of the explosion," he was asked. "Well," he replied, "I was standing beside the gun, there was an awful racket, and the doctor said, 'Sit up and take this.'"

Macdonald: Citizen of the World

The Personality of James A. Macdonald of Canada, Editor, Publicist, Preacher, a Foremost Warrior for Peace

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Editor Afield of The Continent

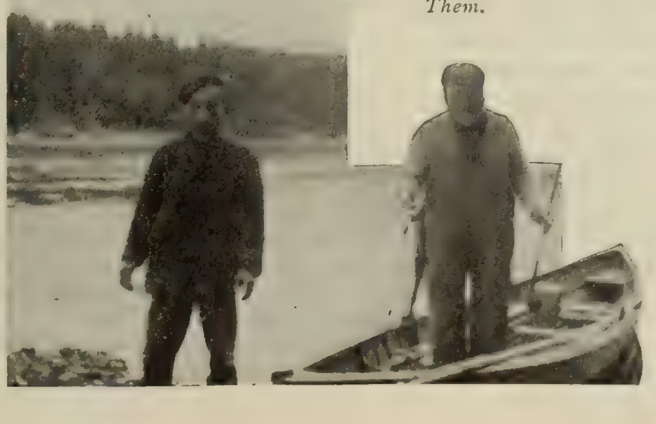
Dr. J. A. Macdonald Speaking in the Open Air at the Opening of a Recreation Park for Employees of The Toronto Globe

TO START with the nearest fact about him; Dr. James A. Macdonald, editor of The Toronto Globe, is doubtless the most popular speaker on the continent today before representative and serious gatherings of importance. That is a large label. Yet the testimony runs that, when speaking upon the same platform with men who have for decades been nationally famous as orators, Dr. Macdonald has consigned them, in the thought of his hearers, to the list of "among those present." It would be embarrassing to mention the names of the great men who have played second fiddle to this wild, stirring bugle from Canada and the Highlands. Many readers will supply instances out of their own experience. There is not a canon of good public speaking—according to the teachers of elocution—which Dr. Macdonald does not smash every five minutes that he is upon the platform. He defies classification, except that he is an orator, in the highest use of that term—the ability to entreat and convince the wills of his hearers.

Tall, big-framed, with a splendid head covered by disheveled brownish-red hair, and every muscle of his great frame atingle with his message, Macdonald is the embodiment of a great idea let loose on the platform. He is utterly heedless of himself and of Mrs. Grundy. An actor could scarcely devise so many strange poses. Sometimes he paces to and fro on the platform like a lion caged. Again he doubles up like a jackknife or crouches like a leopard about to spring. Then he thrusts both hands deep into his pockets and throws back his head. In a moment he has his hands clasped behind his back. Now he is viciously stabbing the air with his forefinger, driving in his point. Or those long arms swing like pendulums. Again he frenziedly rumples his hair or clutches it by handfuls. There is no predicting what his next gesture will be. He slaps his thigh like a man telling a story to a group of his cronies. I have seen him stand for more than a minute on his left leg, kicking the calf of it with his right toe!

All this is utter lack of self-consciousness and abandonment to his theme. The man and the message become one. All these physical contortions and gyrations are scarcely noticed by the hearers—they seem but a part of the speaker's passionate effort to express his sentiment. "Enrapt" is the word to describe the attitude of audiences of thousands of men who sit eager-eyed before this unprofessional, unperfunctory orator. The tense breathing, the unconscious murmurs of assent or emotion, testify to the marvelous sympathy which exists between speaker and hearers. The silence, the expectancy, the forward-bending attitude of the audience, tell their own tale. The primal art, which cynics declare lost, of one man's ability to move the deepest passions of the many through the spoken word, belongs to this messenger of the great, elemental truths.



He Can Catch Fish, Too, When He Has Time to Go After Them.

Such an orator does not have to entertain his hearers. Nor does he need to consider the small etiquette of occasion. I have heard Macdonald arraign, in Amos fashion, methods of "big business," while Wall street magnates sat on the platform with him; and puncture the professionalism of politicians while the leading politicians of the day listened to him. No man-pleaser is this herald of the glad tidings of democracy and international good will.

These are the twin notes of the Macdonald utterances. Naturally, he speaks to a number of themes, and illuminates all he touches; but since democracy and internationalism are the two profoundest expressions of his life, they appear in a hundred guises. By the sheer compulsion of his convictions Macdonald has made himself a world-leader upon these subjects. He is today the strongest living link between Canada and the United States, and the best interpreter of Canada to Great Britain. The leaders in all parts of the British empire know this man, who is a beacon of loyalty to the crown and a fire of brotherhood to all mankind. The highest mood of our new day is incarnated in James A. Macdonald, ardent Briton and zealous citizen of the world.

The key to this unique character is not far to seek. He is a militant politician—gloating over two score of libel suits as a schoolboy over his athletic prizes. He is a fearless and far-visioned editor, guiding Canada's great newspaper to an ever-enlarging sphere. He is a publicist and an orator, in the highest use of those terms, honored on two continents. But before he is anything else, and underneath everything else, Macdonald is a preacher. He once told me, "The Lord Almighty meant me for an actor." Now Macdonald is good enough Presbyterian to know that if the Lord had meant him for an actor he would have become one! Into the gospel ministry his pious Highland mother sent him (Highlanders they are, although the family has been in Canada for nearly a century and a half), and as a preacher of the Word he has fulfilled his vocation. The fact that the fashion and location of his pulpit has changed is merely incidental.

He himself has dropped the "Rev." from his name, and one oftener sees the prefix "Honorable"; the "Dr." (LL. D. from Glasgow University) affords a convenient compromise. He is quite confident that he is the first of all an editor, and a politician. That he is successfully both these things is entirely due to the fundamental fact that he is a preacher of righteousness; his inspiration, his viewpoint, his motive and his method are entirely those of the minister of the gospel. The walls of his kirk have been widened; his pulpit and his vocabulary are unusually modern, but a preacher he remains to the end. The surest verdict that can be rendered concerning this versatile and brilliant leader, in any of his public functions, is, "That man is a preacher of the glorious gospel of the Son of God."

A Message from America to Scotland

Catch the man off guard some time, perhaps in the period of relaxation and sleeplessness after he has made a great address, and draw him out on his own past and his views of his work. It quickly becomes clear that the Presbyterian in him is still dominant as he relates what he believes to be the greatest hour in his life, the occasion when he bore a message from President Taft to the two Presbyterian Assemblies of Scotland. The public recalls how near to President Taft was Dr. Macdonald in promoting closer relations between Canada and the States, and Great Britain and the States, and the two men are good friends. When Macdonald visited the old country to attend the imperial press conference, he bore with him, as a means of attracting Britain's attention to the theme which was uppermost in his mind, greetings from President Taft to the United Free Church Assembly and to the United Presbyterian Assembly of Scotland. When he arose to deliver them the announcement was made, "A message from the President of the United States," and the Assemblies, who do things in statelier fashion on the other side, instantly rose to their feet, as when the magic words are pronounced in parliament, "A message from the king." To retell the story of those two great speeches, and how the spirit of the two churches rose to them, is beyond me. It lifted the speaker to his greatest heights, and he cherishes those days as his most golden memories, although ovations are to him a commonplace experience.

Probably nobody ever heard Macdonald make a long speech without listening to passages of Scripture. With deftness and originality the orator points his finest passages with a phrase or an incident from the most living of books. One reason for this is that Scripture grips the imagination as does no other literature. Macdonald is a Highlander, and his logic is always set on fire by his imagination. He sees his message as a poet sees his theme. To be with him in the process of constructing a new speech is an experience. Everywhere is his study. Walking down Broadway he tentatively asks his friend what he thinks of such and such a theme for an address. Then, as he begins to glow, he clutches one's arm and, oblivious to the tide of humanity eddying all about him, pursues his thought with the zest of a hunter. Even as he speaks the theme takes full shape, and one perceives the very joy of a creator in the enthusiasm of this man whom many conventions have not jaded. He goes upon the public platform with the same solemn burden on his soul that the preacher carries to the pulpit. First and last, James A. Macdonald is a messenger of truth. That he has functioned outside of the pulpit suggests disturbing thoughts concerning the many ministers in like case; but that theme is not to be followed here.

Perhaps this is as good a place as any to tell of Dr. Macdonald's training. He was born in Middlesex, Ontario, in 1862, and educated at Hamilton, Toronto, and Edinburgh, graduating from Knox College, Toronto, in 1887. He was pastor of Knox church at St. Thomas, Ontario, from 1891 to 1896. Then he entered religious journalism, becoming editor of The Westminster. In this period his public service widened, and he was a member of the board of governors of the University of Toronto.

It was while editor of The Westminster that Macdonald discovered Ralph Connor, whose books have since become famous. The very pen name "Ralph Connor" was devised by Macdonald, who felt it would be indiscreet to print Rev. Charles W. Gordon's name to a story of the Northwest that used so much unclerical language. It was his giving to the world this young writer whom he had trained that first won wide attention for Macdonald. Now his own fame has become such that this incident is seldom mentioned. As might be expected, The Westminster grew under his management and absorbed four other papers.

Dr. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier on a Steamer Bound for England

It was quite a promotion, and somewhat of an experiment, for a Presbyterian minister to be made editor of The Toronto Globe, the great liberal organ of the dominion. This is a position as powerful politically as it is journalistically; and Macdonald is no politician in the professional sense of that term, but a master politician in that he knows the irresistible power of straight-spoken truth over the minds of the masses. There is no finesse equal to sincerity. The politicians have not yet discovered an art that can overcome an able man of absolute sincerity and devotion to the public welfare. Steadily since Macdonald assumed the tripod, the old Globe has grown in prestige and power, and now there are tens of thousands of persons, especially in the States, who know it as the paper which Macdonald edits, whereas it used to be that men knew Macdonald as the man who edits The Globe.

A Fine Field for a Man Who Likes Fighting

The editorship of a great daily newspaper is a fine field for a man who likes a fight, and the Grant and the Cameron and the Macdonald—all Highland strains—have not found their confluence in this man for naught. He clearly loves a row for righteousness' sake. I chanced upon him in Toronto one day when he was exulting over a fresh libel suit from a leading politician of the old school. Macdonald was having great joy in expressing his opinion and abhorrence of this fellow, whom he accused of trying to Tammanyize Toronto. The man had formally served notice that if any more accusations were made against him he would sue the paper for libel. Straightway the next issue bore on its front page, as well as on its editorial page, such a blistering arraignment of the man as should end his career in Canada. Macdonald actually delights in a fight of this sort. He is not content to stay in his office, but on the stump he strikes the blows of a Richard the lion-hearted.

Patriotism is a passion with this man. He has never swerved a hair's breadth in his loyalty to Canada. Where other men would tickle their hearers' ears, when talking on this side of the border, by allusions to a union of the two countries, Macdonald stands steadfast for the higher spiritual union which yet remains loyal to the British crown.

Canada Would Take Hand of Britain and America

Says Dr. Macdonald: "History has made Canada a part of the British empire; geography has made her the next-door neighbor of the United States. The marvelous commingling of the nationalities within her citizenship has given her vital and interpretative relations with both. Canada would take full advantage of her unique and strategic position. She would take the hand of Britain and the hand of the United States and across the uniting boundary line of 4,000 miles pledge a troth which no political exigency or selfish interest of bigoted jingoism can ever weaken or break."

The larger patriotism of peace and of human democracy resound in magnificent organ tones throughout Macdonald's messages. He and Woodrow Wilson are the two men on this continent who are speaking fully, philosophically and illuminatingly upon the theme of democracy. Both, whether they know it or not, imbibe the passion from generations of ancestors who were inoculated with this spirit through training in the Presbyterian Church.

Because he holds his office of molder of thought as the highest mission of man, Macdonald has repeatedly refused public office in Canada. It is rumored that he was offered the successorship to Laurier. Twice Scottish Liberals have offered him a seat in parliament from a constituency which has never been anything else but Liberal. This touches his heart, although it does not tempt him, for the Scotch in the man is something more than a pride. He loves the old Highlands as though he had been reared in them. When he discovered a Scotch community down in North Carolina, he visited it and then talked about it for months afterwards with every friend he met. The spell of the homeland, which old Scotia casts upon her sons and daughters, even to the third and fourth generation, is powerful in the blood of James A. Macdonald, citizen of the world and servant of the kingdom of heaven.

Children at Worship

BY HENRY W. HULBERT

IT IS A MATTER of moment that we are experiencing in our churches of every denomination a notable change in the attitude of the leaders toward worship on the part of children in the great congregation. About twice as many churches are making earnest experiments in this direction as were doing so a year ago It is more and more evident that the vital thing with a child, as with an adult, is to bring the heart into direct and conscious contact with God. This can be done, of course, at the mother's knee better than in any other place. But next to that the result can bes be reached in the most impressive service the church holds, the morning worship.

It is found that the efficiency of that occasion depends for al the participants upon its vital simplicity and reality. No one element helps to this end more powerfully than the presence an assistance of the children, even the little ones, who may be welcomed to regular attendance at as early an age as will warrant reverent attitude of heart. The older children learn to be interested in the entire morning service; while in many cases thos under 8 or 9 years of age, after participating in the opening portion leave the assembly for a service of their own in the church parlors Where these are lacking a neighboring house is utilized, especiall in the rural sections.

In many instances the kindergarten and primary departments o the Sunday school utilize this plan and thus have, after the openin exercises in the church, a full hour of instruction with the whole Sunday school equipment at their disposal. In quite a number of instances the junior Christian Endeavor society utilizes this plan for special children's services. Again, the hour thus available is used for children's missionary societies, or Sunday clubs, or a supplementary Sunday school hour for Bible stories, children's choir practice and other helpful plans.

This method of utilizing the morning worship half hour for children, continued from the age of 4 years until 8 or 9, leads the child into closest contact with the warmest spiritual life of the church and is capable of bringing the young heart into the spirit of true worship. The habit of church attendance is firmly fixed, and that, too, on a purely voluntary basis. The Sunday school and the young people's societies are markedly helped. The family unit appears once more in the church at morning worship. The home feels the impulse. This in turn brings an added spirit of worship to the individual and helps reinstate the family altar.

The various plans thus used to give religious training to the young, adapted to each local situation, affect notably the number of young people between the ages of 12 and 15 joining the church. Few among the large number, continuing under such a thorough religious training, fail to come forward in due time into active church membership. The church grows steadily and naturally, and the new material is well grounded in the Bible and finely drilled in hymnology and has in hand a trained religious expression.

The remarkable thing is that, with all this increase in the number of churches thinking out along this line, there are still so many who are hesitant in trying out an undertaking so wise and far-reaching for the children. The majority seem content to continue a system in which, on the average, only one-fifth of the Sunday school scholars finally become church members, while four-fifths are lost to the church. Such proportions would be ruinous in any business undertaking. Infant mortality like that would be accounted criminal. While the Sunday school is the right arm of the church and furnishes the great majority of the new members, it cannot take the vital place of the church worship itself in the training of the young soul.

No one plan can fit all situations. Necessity is the mother of invention. More church conferences should bring together the varied experiences of the church in handling this problem. We are on the eve of new life and power in the church, which must come primarily by utilizing all our modern pedagogical knowledge and skill for the natural growth of the kingdom of God. We are still to be freshly assured by a strong experience of the wisdom of Jesus, who brought forward, as an exemplar of the essential heart of humility necessary for every follower of his, a little child. The prophet said more truly than we as yet understand, "A little child shall lead them."

Getting Up Early

"I reckon," said the first farmer, "that I get up earlier than anybody in this neighborhood. I am always up before 3 o'clock in the morning."

The second farmer said he was always up before then and had part of the chores done. The first farmer thought he was a liar and decided to find out. A few mornings later he got up at 2 o'clock and went to the neighbor's house. He rapped on the back door and the woman of the house opened it.

"Where is your husband?" asked the farmer, expecting to find the neighbor in bed.

"He was around here early in the morning," answered the wife, "but I don't know where he is now."

A Mother of the Pioneers

BY J. A. LAURIE

THE OLDEST living white child of the Pacific Northwest is Mrs. Eliza Spalding Warren, daughter of Rev. Henry H. Spalding, the pioneer missionary. Mrs. Warren is still enjoying good health and resides at Lakeside, Washington, on the shore of Lake Chelan. She has the priceless journal which records the journey of her mother and Mrs. Whitman across the plains in 1836. The last entry closes with a prayer for "little Eliza," that she "may become a blessing to this country and people," a prayer which those who know this white-haired poineer believe has been abundantly answered. Four score years will soon have passed since the young physician, Marcus Whitman, and his companion, Henry Spalding, set out with their young wives on that 3,500 mile wedding trip to the then foreign region known as Oregon. A journey that can now be completed with comfort in less than a week then required seven months of peril and hardship. These missionary brides were the first white women to cross the continent. It was six years later when Fremont, "the pathfinder," crossed the Rockies; Stanbury led the first corps of United States engineers through South pass thirteen years afterwards. Probably no wedding trip from Atlantic to Pacific will ever attract greater attention than this one which was destined to mark the beginning of an epoch in American history. The young knights-errant were told, when at Pittsburg they ended the long stage journey and prepared for the trip down the Ohio to St. Louis, "You can never get the women through." When they left that farthest west outpost for the journey up river to Council Bluffs, old trappers said, "Your women will both be kidnaped."

When with the caravan of the American Fur Company, which they overtook after a hard four weeks' chase, they had reached the mountain rendezvous of the traders many rough plainsmen bared their heads and wept like children at the sight of white women. Over 2,000 Indians, expectantly awaiting the arrival of the missionaries with the promised "white man's book of heaven," welcomed the travel-worn band with most spectacular demonstrations and followed for miles, along the buffalo track, in silent admiration, as the devoted company pushed westward. Before the caravan flew the news, "White squaws, white as snow, are coming," and Nez Perces, Snakes, Bannocks and Flatheads came out to meet them. Proud chiefs climbed the mountain slope to accompany them down and dusky women pressed the hands and kissed the cheeks of their white sisters. The first wagon to mark the great plains from the Missouri to the Columbia was that of the "beloved physician" of this quartet of Christian pathfinders. A quart of seed wheat was also brought along, from which eleven years later a harvest of some 30,000 bushels was garnered. Apple trees were planted at both the new mission stations, some of which stand today and which have furnished numerous gavels for presbyteries and synods and for the General Assembly of 1909. Dr. Whitman also set up and operated the first printing press in the Northwest, some of the earliest printed matter produced being still cherished by the children of the Indians first receiving it. The first white child born in old Oregon was Alice Whitman, who was drowned when 2 years old. The daughter of Rev. and Mrs. Spalding was born shortly after, in 1837, and was the first white child to grow to maturity in the vast region west of the Rockies and north of the present states of California and Nevada. This mother of pioneers has an excellent memory of a day when there was no San Francisco, and when Portland consisted of a log cabin in a clearing, which was sold for a pack of skins.

Mrs. Eliza Warren
From an old photograph

Mrs. Warren was a child of 10 attending Mrs. Whitman's school at Lapwaai when the Whitman massacre took place, and she saw both the noble doctor and his wife killed. For three weeks she was a prisoner with thirty-eight other women and children, who were afterwards ransomed. At the pioneers' reunion held in connection with the Lewis and Clark exposition in Portland Mrs. Warren was the central figure and the oldest pioneer on the platform. Six strong Nez Perces churches stand today as a living memorial to the work of her consecrated parents.

Those acquainted with the whole story believe our nation owes hundreds of miles of sea coast on this Pacific shore to the patriotism and consecration of that little band, who on July 4, 1836, unfurled old glory on the summit of the continent and, after a short service of Bible reading, prayer and song, took possession of the Pacific slope for God and the union.

THE HOME COUNCIL

John Henry's First Real Fourth

BY SARA B. GOODMAN

There is at least one place in which the Fourth, though decidedly sane, is celebrated with no abatement of patriotic ardor. This is the state institution in Michigan in which John Henry is being molded into a good citizen. The writer of this little story of one day of patriotism and fun was for many years a teacher in this institution, and speaks from an experience as intimate at it was lively.

JOHN HENRY had been constantly meeting surprises during the six weeks he had been at the school. But there was one very great surprise still in store for him—the Fourth. John Henry was 8, and he didn't know about the Fourth. Of the thirty-four boys in his cottage he and one other were the only ones who didn't know. A big boy was telling them about it.

"Firecrackers till ye can't rest!" said the boy. "And torpedoes for the little kids, and ice cream for dinner, and a picnic in the orchard!"

John Henry caught his breath. He recalled his last Fourth of July. He had loitered around the village streets, envying the fortunate boys who had firecrackers, but with never a one of his own. Was it true? Should he actually have some tomorrow?

Down the walk came the brisk young kindergartner. "Mrs. Carter!" she called to the matron. "Please let all your kindergarten boys come to the schoolhouse before breakfast tomorrow. We're going to march to the dining room all together."

The "kindergarten bunch" danced and shouted and turned handsprings.

"Yes," the big boy went on, "and in the evening we have fireworks."

"Gee!" said John Henry to himself; "wonder if they let the boys shoot 'em off?"

"Come, boys," called the matron, and the troop tumbled in after her, each boy taking his place in the row of chairs around the playroom. There was no time to answer the thousand and one questions which John Henry longed to ask, so he wisely concluded to wait and see.

The Scripture recitation and prayers were duly finished in concert. "My country, tissuf thee" was lustily sung, then, more softly, "Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me," and the littlest boy was sent to bed, in charge of the oldest. The rest followed in groups, according to age.

"You'll be wanting to get up early," the matron said. "Oh, you wait and see," she warded off the questions that followed. "You'll have a good time." And with that she dismissed the last one. Talking in the dormitories was strictly forbidden, but John Henry was bursting with curiosity.

"Does we git more'n one firecracker?" he besought of the boy next to him in a whisper.

"More'n one? Well, I guess!" was the gratifying answer "More'n forty!"

John Henry was more than ever confounded. Forty for one boy! How many would it take for 300 boys? His head swam at the idea, and he promptly went to sleep, to be awakened in the night, as he thought it, by a boom that brought all the boys out of bed with a shout.

Rules were relaxed for the day and they tore downstairs, after the scantiest of toilets. The privileged big boy rushed to the engine house, where the engineer had improvised a cannon and was giving a rousing salute.

When the rising bell rang the Fourth of July had really begun. As long as he lived, John Henry never forgot that day. From the city below the hill came answering roars of cannon. Two big boys were already raising the great flag over the central building, and each matron brought forth several dozen small flags and appointed a committee of boys to decorate its special cottage, with the injunction, "Now make our cottage the best trimmed one in the row."

The little boys were duly scrubbed and invested with clean waists and sent to the schoolhouse, where the kindergartner, in a fresh white dress, with red, white and blue ribbons, provided them with soldier caps, badges and every noise producer known to the accomplished kindergartner, and formed them into line. Trumpets, drums, cymbals and triangles were distributed, and any lack of these was supplied by abundant flags. The first breakfast bell rang and a word of command straightened the line and set dancing feet in orderly military position. The second bell, and from each cottage filed forth the children, 300 strong, to the great dining room. All paused behind the red stools, and then appeared the advance guard of the kindergarten army, a tiny boy struggling to hold an immense flag "straight up." Round and round the long tables marched the "army with banners." The big boys cheered, and the superintendent, beaming like a big boy himself, surreptitiously and with rousing effect touched off a giant cracker in a corner of the big room.

The wee soldiers found their places and sat down. Grace was said, flags were exchanged for spoons and everybody fell to eating, for this was only the beginning of events. The bowls of oatmeal and cups of milk and piles of bread disappeared rapidly. The last drop and crumb disposed of, the matrons went down the line and gave each child a package of torpedoes. There was an instant's hush while each one investigated his package. Then, pop! pop! pop! The hardwood floor, big blank walls and high ceiling reverberated with the roar.

"Gee, that was fun!" said John Henry to the boy next him as they marched out. "Wot more does they give us?"

"Firecrackers," responded Jim briefly, as the line broke ranks behind the cottage.

"Git a hustle on now, kids," called big Eugene. "Git them beds made straightway, and you fellers that scrubs git busy. All the work has to be done 'fore Mrs. Carter gits back or the other cottages 'll git out first."

Did they work? A force of bedmakers went whooping upstairs. The scrubbers made a dive for the box where the rags were, formed a long line across the room and the hardwood floor had its daily polishing in a trice. The bathroom boys scoured the tub, rinsed the clothes, hustled soiled towels into the hampers, scrubbed out the bowls and put away all out-of-place articles. The little boys straightened the playroom, moved out chairs for the big boy who swept, replaced them, shaking out small rugs and piling up books and toys on the big table, and otherwise made themselves useful. All worked with such energy that Mrs. Carter, half an hour later, found the cottage in spick-and-span order.

"Good boys," she laughed. "Wish you'd do it that way every day. Get the fire, Eugene."

Eugene seized a big tin pail and plunged forthwith to the engine house. He returned in a few minutes with a mass of coals in the bottom. Mrs. Carter handed out long sticks of "punk," and while Eugene was lighting these she brought in thirty-four bunches of firecrackers. The pail of fire was set out on the cement walk in front of the cottage and Eugene lighted the first cracker. From all the other cottages poured the boys, with pails of fire and bunches of crackers, and bedlam reigned unconfined for an hour.

About 10 o'clock the din subsided. Every matron called in her boys. An order came from the superintendent: "Every boy not actually needed in preparation of dinner please come to the chapel at the ringing of the bell, prepared for the great parade."

Each matron hastily gathered up flags, streamers of red, white and blue, drums, trumpets, etc., and as the big bell on the house top pealed forth its summons from each cottage the line moved on into the great chapel. There was a short program of recitations and songs, the "Red, White and Blue" was sung with more energy than melodiousness, and the superintendent gave a brief talk, telling what many of the children had never before heard—the story of the Fourth. Then he announced the great parade, to be led by himself, and another whoop of delight went up, for he produced a big shining dishpan, and with a clothespin for a drumstick began to beat time for the march.

Around the building and out onto the beautiful lawn they went, pausing to salute the great flag as it snapped and strained at the staff high above the central building, then on around the row, around the hospital, where the nurses held up weak little heads to look out and the head nurse herself marshaled on the upper veranda all the convalescents; around the engine house, even around the barns, and back to the lawn before the row. Here they halted, and with a final "three times three," turned from an orderly procession into a mob of riotous youngsters.

"All workers wanted at once," said the matrons, and the force scattered in every direction—to kitchen, pantry, laundry and barn. All unnecessary work was omitted today, but certain things must be done in every department.

Dinner was the next event; not such a wonderful dinner, some boys might say, but a good one, with ice cream for dessert. John Henry had never tasted ice cream! After dinner there was a lull. The little boys had to take naps. The older ones washed dishes and put things in order and helped pack the big baskets and hampers to be taken down to the orchard for the picnic supper.

At 3 the fire pails were filled once more and another heap of firecrackers appeared, and again the earth trembled. By the time this ecstasy was over the big boys were summoned and for an hour there was an excitement of preparation for supper.

At the first supper bell grimy hands were scrubbed and tow heads and black heads, red heads and woolly heads were combed, so far as close cuts could admit. At the second bell the long line started on its way to the orchard to eat under the green trees. Thick slices of bread and butter, chunks of meat, cheese, and pickles vanished like magic, and huge pans of cookies were emptied in a twinkling.

When the last crumb was gone the groups filed back to the cottages, and the boys began to gather on the cottage porches and dispose themselves in groups to get the best view of the fireworks. John Henry had learned long before this that his assistance would not be required in sending up rockets and adjusting pinwheels. The fireworks were to be sent up by the engineer and competent assistants from the roof of the school building.

With the dusk came a chill east wind. The boys, in their summer clothing, shivered, but nobody could think of going into the house. Visions of colds in the head and croupy coughs came to Mrs. Carter as she came out, herself wrapped in a shawl.

"Get the blankets," said this resourceful lady, and a detailed force of boys rushed upstairs and despoiled the bed.

Many carriages drove up from the city and interested citizens watched the fireworks and smiled at the groups of children huddled on the porches, wrapped in brown blankets like so many young Comanches. The comparison was not inapt in other respects, for each rocket that went up was followed by a yell that would have done credit to any tribe of Indians.

But at last the final piece was lighted. A great American flag hung in radiant light for a time all too brief, and from the girls' cottage came the first notes of "The Star-Spangled Banner," increasing in volume as group after group took it up.

It was over. Half an hour later silence reigned over the big building. John Henry knew about the Fourth of July. "Gee!" he said, as he climbed into bed; "I wisht I was just gettin' up this mornin'!"

YOUNG AMERICA

Their Red, White and Blue Day

BY ELIZABETH ELLIS SCANTLEBURY

"WE HAVEN'T even a flag to celebrate with!" "If we had only saved the teenty ones we had last Fourth we could have a p'rade!" wailed Dick and Dorothy.

"Let's ask muvver what to do," suggested Peggy, and away to mother flew the twins, Peggy following as fast as her rolly-poly little body would let her.

"What can we do on the Fourth, mother?" they cried in concert.

"Let's have a red, white and blue day and surprise daddy," said mother, smiling mysteriously.

"Oh, goody!" piped Peggy.

"How?" asked Dick.

"What is a red, white and blue day?" begged Dorothy.

"I'll tell you Fourth of July morning," laughed mother. "It will be my secret until then; after that you may each have a little piece of it."

Dorothy, Dick and Peggy, with their father and mother, were spending the summer in a log cabin, high up among the pine trees, where the air was dry and clear, and where mother, who had been ill, might rest and get well. The place was miles away from their home in the big western city, and everything the family could get along without had been packed and stored until they went back in the fall; for, while there was, as Dorothy said, "such lots of outdoors and sky," there was very little room in the log cabin.

The life was so new and strange and free that the children had been perfectly happy in their playhouses among the trees, making the acquaintance of the hens and chickens, the cow and the little black calf that their father had bought so they might have plenty of eggs and milk, and romping with their dog Philip. But now the Fourth was coming, and nothing, as Dick said, "to celebrate with." However, mother had promised to plan for them and the children knew she would do her best that they might have a good time.

The night before the Fourth the bright "bed-time star" had hardly time to show itself when the children, with eyes shut tight, were trying to hurry up the morning. The next thing that Peggy and Dorothy knew mother was standing beside their bed with a smile on her face. She whispered something to each one and then went to Dick's room and whispered to him.

"Now keep your secrets as long as you can," she laughed.

Eyes twinkled and lips puckered in the delight of having a secret and trying not to tell it. As soon as they were dressed Dorothy ran in one direction and Dick in another, while Peggy stood quite still with a puzzled look on her face.

Mother, who was watching, said softly, "Look up, Peggy," Peggy looked up and up, until she saw something away above her head that made her clap her hands and laugh. Dorothy and Dick heard her and came running to see what the fun was about.

"I've found——" cried Peggy; then she put her hand over her mouth, but she just couldn't help looking up again.

Dorothy looked up, too—and clapped her hands.

"Oh, Peggy! I b'lieve our secrets are just alike," she said laughing.

Dick looked pretty sober, but mother whispered, "Go look in the grass, Dick."

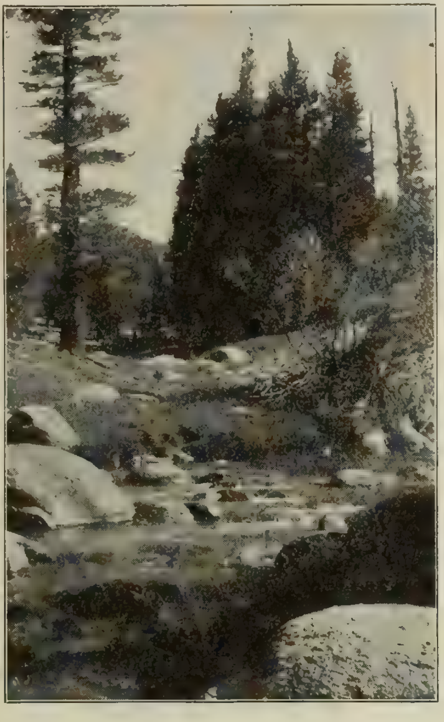
Then mother called the children in, one at a time, and when Dorothy went out she had on a long apron that covered her all over—to wear until breakfast time, mother told her. Peggy was wrapped in a light cape of mother's, and looked very important and mysterious.

Dick went into the house with a rueful face and holding something behind him.

"Are these right, mother?" he asked as he gave her what he held.

"We're living in Make Believe Land today, dear; we are going to be perfectly happy even if we haven't everything we would like—and these are lovely, and just right," she added, smiling.

In a little while daddy, who had been milking the cow, came in to breakfast, Dorothy and Peggy with him and dropping apron and cape as they danced in. Mother and Dick stood beside the white-covered table, on which were blue camping-out plates and in the center a bowl of red clover blossoms—Dick's "find." Mother wore a blue gingham dress and white apron, and had a gorgeous red bow tied under her chin. Dick had a broad red band around the sleeve of his blouse, all in blue stood Dorothy, while Peggy wore her very best white dress of last summer.



"The fairy dell, near a lovely stream"

"Oh, I've guessed mother's secret!" cried Dorothy.

"And I know, too!" shouted Dick.

"I guess—p'haps—I know," said Peggy, in a hesitating little voice.

"Why, why! What's all this?" asked daddy. "Seems to me we are pretty gay this morning."

"It's Fourth of July, daddy!"

"An' red, white an' blue——"

"Isn't it fun?"

"Don't we look like a flag when we stand together—'most?"

Daddy covered his ears and looked at mother.

"Let me introduce you, sir," said mother. "The names of these little maidens are White and Blue, and this is my little page, Red. All day long each one will seek and claim his or her own color in air, in water and on land."

"An' I looked up at the sky 'an' found the white clouds first thing after mother told me where to look."

"And then I looked and every bit of the rest of the sky was blue."

"I found the clover—but it isn't real red."

"Now, let's have breakfast," said mother; "after that we will go on a journey to a fairy dell. Perhaps we shall find out of what the fairies make their flags when they decorate for a party."

"Oh, we're not a bit hungry!"

"Let's start right away!"

Peggy couldn't speak; the very mention of fairies filled her with delight too great for tongue to tell.

"Well, well," said daddy, "do you think the fairies would mind having a man around? Of course I'm too heavy to sit on a toadstool, but perhaps if I lie down and keep very still they'll think I'm a mountain."

The children were sure they couldn't eat, but found that, after all, toast, eggs and cocoa were pretty good after their run out of doors. After breakfast Dorothy and Dick helped mother wash and put away the dishes and Peggy fed her little bantam hen. Then, while mother packed a basket all by herself—and no one could have even one little peep at it—father hunted for "something fine to wear," so the fairies wouldn't turn him out of their enchanted palace if he got a chance to visit it. When he came out of the cabin he had on his head a white paper "soldier hat" with long streamers of red and blue like Dorothy's dress and Dick's arm band.

"Oh, you're all our colors, like mother!" and Dorothy and Peggy hugged daddy round the knees, while Dick giggled to see his father in such a funny hat.

The "fairy dell," near a lovely stream where soft green pines and slender white birches grew, was too far from the log cabin for the children to go alone. Today the way seemed short as they ran races with Philip—who thought it was his picnic, too—and hunted for their colors as they went. Dorothy found more of her color than either of the others. Everywhere she looked there seemed to be something blue—bluebells, blue iris, the ripening service berries, the blue sky and at last the blue stream. But loveliest of all, she thought, were the bluebirds.

"The bluebirds here are not like the bluebirds I saw in grandpa's orchard when I was East with mother," said Dick. "They had breasts almost the same as a robin's, but these are every bit blue."

"These are called mountain bluebirds," mother explained. "See how glossy that little fellow's coat is! There is his mate, all in gray, with a band of blue trimming on her wings and tail."

"I can't find hardly anything that's red," complained Dick. "Is there ever a bird of that color?"

Just then there was a "chip-churr" in the top of a pine tree near by, and there, as if he had called to Dick, was a bright red bird with black wings and a black tail. Mother motioned to all to keep very still, so everyone had a good look before Mr. Scarlet Tanager flew away to his mate, who, unlike her husband, wore a dress so dark no one had noticed her.

"I wish I could see a white bird," sighed Peggy. "I s'pose there never is a white bird anywhere."

"Then we would have all the colors for a bird flag," said Dorothy.

"There is a white bird in this part of the country that is called 'Clark's Crow.' If I see one I'll tell you, Peggy," came from daddy, who was lying on his back looking up through the tree tops.

No "white crow" appeared, but suddenly daddy jumped to his feet and stood listening with a hand behind one ear.

"Ha! methinks I hear the silvery horn of fairy mermaids! The meaning of that music sweet? 'Tis an invitation to bathe in the waters clear that surround their palace fair."

"Come, children," said mother in good understandable English; "you may put on these old

The Sleepy Stars ❧ By Mary Carolyn Davies

Last night I stayed up very late,
For hours and hours—till almost eight.
But my eyes kept a-shutting so!
And then I really wished to go
To bed, and so we went upstairs;
And when I had said all my prayers,
I looked up in the sky, to see
The baby stars look down at me.
And all the stars were winking so
To keep awake—the way I know
I had to wink, myself, last night—
And the tired little moon was white.
I never knew before just how
They felt at night, but I know now.
And so I prayed to God that he Would put the stars to bed, like me.

July 13, 1913—Moses Prepared for His Work

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 2:11-25; Acts 7:17-29; Hebrews 11:23-27. Golden Text, Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.

The last time we saw Moses he was a babe. Today he is a man of 40. Stephen in his address before the council contributes two verses from which we gather all that we really know of the intervening years. Moses was nourished by the daughter of Pharaoh, instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians and became mighty in words and deeds. The biography is brief and yet it is full. The most important years of his youthful life, variously estimated at from seven to twelve, were spent in his own home. Of this there is no definite information, but it was quite long enough to shape and color his entire future. The first seven years are said to be the foundation of all that follow. The mother of Moses was no doubt a remarkable teacher. The world is indebted to her for the mental endowment of her son. One can easily imagine that mother going about her daily task of instruction. She would begin, of course, with the unity of God. The story of the patriarchs would early become a part of his very life.

Moses' Conception of God Foundation Stone of His Life

Moses was a descendant of the chosen of God. There was an aristocracy about the ancient Jew that lifted him above the kings of the earth. No matter where he was, the blood of Abraham flowed through his veins. The gods of the earth were the merest statuary, but his God rode upon the wings of the wind and the very clouds were the dust of his feet. One's conception of God lies at the very basis of his life. The ascent of Sinai was begun from that little home in the marshes of the Nile. There was also the human element in that mother's instruction. The history of Joseph was doubtless a part of the daily lessons. The oppression of Pharaoh kindled a fire that burned with an increasing flame in after years. Though this may not be a matter of record, there are circumstances which tell a story as true as any record.

But the time came for the son of Jochebed to leave his mother's home for the home of Thermuthis, the traditional name of his adopted mother. A new world now opened before him. His life would be that of the court. The legends represent him as a young man of striking appearance.

Theology of Egypt Not Entirely Devoid of Truth

At this time Egypt ranked among the most scholarly nations of the world. She had her great universities, one of which, Heliopolis, was but twenty miles from the reigning city of Memphis. Its course is said to have embraced the entire range of learning. Mathematics, astronomy, the arts, navigation and the use of arms must have been included in the mastery of Egyptian wisdom. The theology of Egypt was intricate, but not entirely devoid of truth. It taught the immortality of the soul, a day of judgment and the triumph of the righteous dead.

Moses had now reached his fortieth year and so far had seemed indifferent to the cause of his countrymen. But an unexpected incident compelled him to declare himself. The sight of an Egyptian smiting a Hebrew awoke the man within him. The decisive moment had come. Monuments and palaces sank out of sight, and a little hut down in the Nile marshes stood out before him. No one can have two mothers. Jochebed and Thermuthis cannot abide in the same heart. Moses struck for his countryman and slew the Egyptian. His countryman was in danger and he hastened to the rescue. His defense was in response to the call of blood. Its consequence was a new grave out in the sands which marked the spot where the Egyptian ended and the Israelite began.

The next day Moses saw two Hebrews striving together, and naturally interfered. But the Moses of yesterday was not there. Now he would be a peacemaker, but his services were rejected. King Solomon long ago observed that "he that vexeth himself with strife belonging not to him is like one that taketh a dog by the ears." Moses had taken a dog by the ears and it turned to bite him. The crime of yesterday was discovered, so he fled to Midian and left Israel to its fate.

But no one ever escaped from either God or himself. The priest of Midian had seven daughters who had just filled the watering troughs with water for their father's flock. But the shepherds drove their flocks away and appropriated the results of their labors.

Moses Uses His Strength in Aid of the Weak

Moses had just escaped one quarrel and a second awaited him. This time it was the weak against the strong. We learn from monumental inscriptions that physical culture was an accomplishment highly regarded by the Egyptians, and Moses was not slow to apply his knowledge. The shepherds were possibly the stronger of the two, but the battle lies not so much with the strong as it does with the one who knows how to use his strength. The description is brief but expressive. "Moses stood up and helped them." As a consequence the daughters returned home earlier than usual. Their father Reuel with Oriental courtesy invited the stranger to his house, where he was content to dwell. One of the daughters, Zipporah, became his wife and Moses went back to the occupation of his fathers and for forty years lived a shepherd in the land of Midian.

But no man can escape his mission. The south winds were laden with the sighs of a nation. It was Israel calling for its leader. Moses heard it, but the time was not yet ripe. That he was satisfied with his mode of life is scarcely probable. The name of his first born, Gershom, meaning a "stranger," shows the loneliness of his life. But God's decrees make a chain of many links. Moses himself was not ready. There was a self-mastery to which he had not yet attained. The sickle was being ground and the grain was growing yellow. And the God of Moses is the God of all.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—An all-round man needs an all-round experience. Moses was seeking for truth and came suddenly upon injustice. His passion resulted in his exile. A long silence is broken by a single ray of hope indicated by the name he gave his son.

To trace the career of eminent men through their changing environment would be an interesting study. Perhaps very few have risen to distinction who remained for a lifetime amid the scenes of their nativity. Perhaps the broadest man is the one whose boyhood has been spent in the country and his manhood in the complex and changing life of the city.

It was needful that Moses should have a slave's birth that he might know the world's sorrows; that he should have Egyptian culture to give his mind breadth and power; but not less that he should spend years of solitude amid the deserts of Arabia thinking through the problems which would confront him as the founder of a new state and a reformer in a well nigh forgotten religion.

The task for which Moses was being divinely fitted was the greatest ever laid before any man. It was nothing less than to create an ideal church in an ideal state. He was to be the world's first great monotheistic teacher; the world's first moral philosopher; the world's first great democrat.

Moses Determines to Know and Is Aroused to Do

Verse 11—The first requisite for a reformer, civil or religious, is a passion for truth and the second is a passion for justice. Truth can be possessed only by going to the fountainhead of fact. There were, it is said, 20,000 books in the library at the capital of Egypt in Moses' day. But he could learn more as to a slave's life by going among the slaves one day than by reading them all. The curse of every reform is the theoretical reformer who does all his reforming in his study. One sight of the actual conditions of Israel in Egypt set the soul of Moses aflame.

Verse 12—Known to be a favorite at court, although Hebrew born, Moses recognized the danger of his personal interference. But his heart was hot, and by one swift blow he put the petty tyrant taskmaster out of commission. Possibly he did not mean to kill, probably he did not care. But like many a man in like position before and since, he was confronted with the problem what to do with the body. The first thing he could think of was to hide it where it fell.

Verse 13-14—Drawn back by the tragedy of yesterday to the scene of his violence, he finds this time a fight going on between two of his own race. He with smooth words seeks to recall them to a better mind. But the scoundrel of the two resents his interference and by a verbal thrust reminds him of the danger in which he stands. Doubtless Moses' position at court was no longer secure. The present rulers were not friendly to him, looked upon him as an interloper and perhaps a spy. What did he mean by prowling around among these Hebrew slaves? Would he after all excite them to rebellion?

Midian Receives the Reformer Whom Egypt Cast Out

Verse 15—There was no time to be lost and he escaped to the land of the Semites, Arabia, inhabited by a tribe descended from Abraham by Keturah. The people were related to the Israelites as are the Germans to the English; that is, bound by a common ancestry, but separated by a diverse development.

Verses 16-17—The incident which occurred when he sat down by the well of the priest of Midian to rest determined for him his future course. The desert was, as is indeed the frontier pasture land of almost every country, the roving ground of a race more violent than chivalric. There may have been then, as there frequently is now, a scarcity of water in the wells, and it was only a question of force which should get first what there was. The male herdsmen ordered the women away, but Moses stood up and the "cowboys" of the desert recognized in the massive frame and physical power and frowning brow and flashing eye of this stranger that they would better not provoke him too far. Moses was not in a mood to be trifled with, we may believe, and he had seen enough of brute strength shoving aside weakness. He would not tolerate it either in Egypt or Midian.

Verses 18-19—Often in such desert wells or springs the first flock exhausts the supply of water and those coming later have to endure a long wait until the basin fills up again. It surprised Reuel that his daughters had accomplished their errand so quickly. Then they told him how a stranger had forced the rude men of the neighborhood to give them the first chance at the water. They confessed they were too much surprised and confused to offer the stranger the usual hospitalities of the home.

Moses' Long Wait Means a Great Preparation for the Future

Verse 20—The father, less excited, made haste to invite so generous an aid to come to his "ranch." Like many a cattleman on the lonely frontier, Reuel was doubtless as glad to have company as Moses was willing to have employment. The fugitive had no definite plans for the future. He had burned all his bridges. The court and the brick kilns were both behind him. There were no relatives in Palestine to beckon him on. He married into the tribe and identified himself with the fortunes of his ruder home.

Verse 22—Yet that his thoughts oft reverted to the land from which he had escaped we may believe when we find he gave his first-born son the name "Sojourner." Whether he was to go back to Egypt or on to Palestine he did not know, but he felt that his life was not to be spent amid these treeless hills and wasted in the care of cattle and hogs.

Verses 23-25—But "it is a long lane that knows no turning." Things were changing in Egypt, apparently for the worse, but to be overruled of God for betterment. "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," said the old Greeks. So long as an indefensible condition remains quiescent it is undisturbed. But when it becomes aggressive it is done away with. The first step toward Israel's exodus was Egypt's increasing insolence.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning July 6, 1913

TOPICS—The building of a tower; the king going to war. Luke 14:28-33.

Great multitudes were following Jesus at this time. Among them were some brave, sincere souls, who were prepared to accept the full consequence of their service of Christ, and to go wherever he might lead them. There were others who had no intention of entering any service which threatened a lot harder than their present one. The mass of the multitude were an idle, thoughtless people, who had followed Jesus without any well defined reason, but with a general idea that the crisis of the kingdom was at hand and a desire not to miss any of its blessings.

Jesus was never deceived by his popularity. He knew that it was not the outgrowth of love. He knew that this following would melt away in the coming hour of trial. Consequently the nearer he drew to his own sufferings and death, the more exacting he became in his requirements of his disciples. In the hour of his sudden rejection nothing could be gained by having a following that would not endure even the slightest tests.

"If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his own father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple. Whosoever doth not bear his own cross, and come after me, cannot be my disciple." Generally the affection of father and mother and kindred is in the highest degree compatible with the service of Christ. But in some critical times it is incompatible. Soon it would come to pass that the renunciation which Jesus demanded would involve not simply the willingness to make the surrender for his sake, but the actuality.

But the agony and crying were not yet upon his followers. The words of Jesus seemed infinitely remote from the fair world of reality, because the people had never considered what sacrifices they might have to make, if they were to continue faithful in their following of him. Therefore he spoke these two parables of the unfinished tower and the relinquished war. And their broad teaching is not that we should refrain from undertaking enterprises too large for our resources, but that we should never engage in any enterprise, least of all his service, without due consideration.

Christ nowhere teaches us that we are not to undertake too large a task; for there is no other task so large as that of being his follower. This embraces all difficulties known to men. Thus the point of the parable is not at all that we should lower our aims to the comfortably attainable. To achieve our great success, we may need to fail in time; for God builds his kingdom on the failure of this world.

But we are to consider that no great achievement can be made without great resources; and that no ambition that ranges throughout eternity can be gratified without an infinite strength of self-surrender.

The builders of the tower of Babel are a permanent human type (Gen. 11:4). They reasoned among themselves that they had built high towers before, and almost reached to heaven; now they would build a higher, and quite reach there. Sometimes we have known a man who, with a purely economic program, would set himself to accomplish the spiritual reformation of a community. Or we have known a man who started to build himself up into a better manhood, and who believed that, without the aid of Christ, he could attain the fullness of the stature of Christ. He began to build a tower without counting the cost.

But the good builder "sits down" first; he takes time to make his estimates and form his plans; and then, without haste or confusion, he builds steadily and strongly, unto the perfection of his holy faith.

The king of the parable would like to make war on another king. But he has only 10,000 soldiers, while his enemy has 20,000. However, this will not necessarily deter him. Thus Josiah made war against Pharaoh-necoh (II. Kings 23:29). In this same spirit the thoughtless Jewish multitude would say: "Oh, the Messiah's kingdom is so much stronger than the kingdom of the Gentiles, that as soon as he appears the army of the gentiles will be utterly routed and destroyed!" Which, of course, would be true, if only they could be sure that the army of the supposed Messiah would have the power of Jehovah in its midst. But this was just the point about which the Jewish people would not sit down and take counsel.

We are just as foolish when we go to war with sin, wether it is in these hearts of ours or in the world about us. We begin to struggle with a bad habit, which we think we can easily uproot and remove. But before our struggle is ended we find that we have arrayed against us all the forces of sin and death. We never know the power of sin until we struggle with it. And even then we do not know it fully. We never know the power of sin until we see the Saviour struggling with it, and overcoming it only in the sacrifice of his own blood.

These parables are intended to turn the people away from their complacent self-confidence in their own ability to build their tower and win their war, to a sense of the need of the resources of omnipotent God. The grace they need they must find in Jesus.

It is vain for us to think that we can save the world while we sit at ease in our houses. We can save the world only as Christ has saved it, by dying for it. Our easy enthusiasms will soon fade out in the day of heat and action; and only the power of a great conviction will enable us to endure unto the end. Have we considered this, when we have offered to follow Christ?

Stop not, loiter not, look not backward, if you would be among the foremost! The great Now, so quick, so broad, so fleeting, is yours—in an hour it will belong to the eternity of the past. The temper of life is to be made good by big honest blows; stop striking and you will do nothing; strike feebly and you will do almost as little. Success rides on every hour; grapple it and you may win; but without a grapple it will never go with you. Work is the weapon of honor, and who lacks the weapon will never triumph.—Ik Marvel.

Let us be silent as to each others' weakness, helpful, tolerant, nay, tender toward each other. Or, if we cannot feel tenderness, we may at least feel pity! May we put away from us the satire which scourges and the anger which brands; the oil and the wine of the good Samaritan are of more avail.—Amiel.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

July 13, 1913

THE DEADLIEST WEAPON

TOPIC—"Speak not evil one of another." James 4:6-12.

The oldest of weapons, the tongue, has ever been the deadliest, wreaking more hurt upon humanity every year than all the weapons out of the arsenals.

This classic utterance upon the tongue is found in the letter of James: "If any stumbleth not in word, the same is a perfect man, able to bridle the whole body also. Now if we put the horses' bridles into their mouths that they may obey us, we turn about their whole body also. Behold, the ships also, though they are so great and are driven by rough winds, are yet turned about by a very small rudder, whither the impulse of the steersman willeth. So the tongue also is a little member, and boasteth great things. Behold, how much wood is kindled by how small a fire! And the tongue is a fire: the world of iniquity among our members is the tongue, which defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the wheel of nature, and is set on fire by hell. For every kind of beasts and birds, of creeping things and things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed by mankind: but the tongue can no man tame; it is a restless evil, it is full of deadly poison. Therewith bless we the Lord and Father; and therewith curse we men, who are made after the likeness of God: out of the same mouth cometh forth blessing and cursing."

"If you are tempted to reveal
A tale someone has told
About another, make it pass,
Before you speak, three gates of gold.

"These narrow gates: First, 'Is it true?'
Then, 'Is it needful?' In your mind
Give truthful answer. And the next
Is last and narrowest, 'Is it kind?'"

The "higher law" by which Christians should live is the law of charity. By the rule of love we surrender our right to speak harsh words concerning another, even if they are true. This forbearance, which is a plant of slow growth, and needing to be watered by grace, marks one as being of Christ's husbandry. Only divine enabling makes possible the love-ruled life.

A sobering truth which everybody must face is that he is certain to misjudge other persons. That is as inevitable as that he will be misunderstood himself. Because all of life's modes of expression are inadequate, we are sure to misinterpret a brother's words or actions; and that not once but often. What rivers of tears have been shed because of this! Lives have been ruined, friendships sundered, hopes blasted, optimism turned to the gall of bitterness, all because we have misjudged our fellows and been misjudged by them. A realization of this condition, instances of which everybody can supply out of his own experience, should make us careful of our speech. A sentinel should be set over against our lips, to guard against cruel and needless and unloving words. Even when we do our best, we are likely to wrong a neighbor by our speech. At least, therefore, we should study to exercise caution.

An old proverb has it that of the unspoken word we are master, but the word that is spoken is master of us.

When a man has spoken unjustly of another there is but one course open to him, if he be a gentleman or a Christian. That is swift, full, free retraction and apology. There is no middle course. Self-respect, sincerity and justice demand this.

A word of comfort costs no more than a word of complaint. And it means more than gold to the receiver. Without descending to insincerity, it is possible to speak a word of praise to somebody every day. The helpers who are all about us, whose ministry we enjoy, these cherish the kind word above wages. The street car conductor is as pleased as he is surprised over a "thank you." The grocer remembers an appreciative word longer than a complaint. There are little children all along the way of life whose days may be brightened by a glad greeting.

"He preached hell without a tear" is the way one editor indicted an evangelist. The harshest truth may be spoken only in tenderness; the harsher the truth the greater the love. If it becomes necessary to speak severely to one, the preparation should be prayer and suffering. For if we enjoy wounding a human spirit, we ourselves are in sore need in our deepest nature.

"Let it be our chief concern to see,
Whatever we are called to do or be,
That all our lives may bear the pure high light
Which shines from yonder throne, that from His sight.
No coward thought need shrink, in trembling fear,
To stand before our God with conscience clear,
And only by his standard set our own,
And live as they who seek his smile alone."

MISSIONARY WORK

Scattering Bibles from Ellis Island

MARY KENDALL HYDE

THE CHILDREN of immigrants landing at Ellis island, especially those detained there for various reasons, make an appealing study. A missionary privileged to go among a group of these bewildered little folks finds cordial greeting and an unusual opportunity. As the children belong to families destined for all sections of the country, an unlimited influence may follow the early sowing of gospel seed in their young hearts. They gladly accept the attractive gospel portions or copy of the psalms offered them by the missionary of the New York Bible Society, who is stationed there purposely to see that every immigrant arriving shall have a copy of Scripture. A little Greek boy became so interested in study of the Bible that he persuaded his parents to buy one for themselves.

A young Russian landing at Ellis island was handed a Testament in his own language; he became converted through reading it and entered a school in Pennsylvania to prepare for the ministry. Very recently news has come from a young Russian who landed here just three years ago and received a New Testament at Ellis island. While talking with the missionary his mind was directed to heavenly things. Not long after he was converted and is now studying for the ministry in an Iowa college.

On board one liner arrived 350 Dutch farmers, coming over to take up lands in Iowa and North Dakota. There were several large families among them, one with thirteen children, and another family of fourteen. Every year 40,000 immigrants settle in New York City. The rest, nearly a million, enter into the life of our country in other places. Of course everything that will help in their education and moral betterment will be a blessing to the nation.

"We are constantly reminded of the extent to which the Scripture is scattered over the United States by our work at Ellis island," says the general secretary, Dr. George William Carter. "A large part of this distribution is necessarily single gospels, usually Luke, bound separately. On the inside cover of these we paste a label explaining about the society and giving our address. As a consequence, letters come to us from all parts of the country—now from a Frenchman in Louisiana, then from a Scandinavian in Minnesota, and again from a Spaniard in New Mexico." There is a man in Nebraska who annually contributes to the New York Bible Society because many years ago, when he landed a stranger from Sweden at Castle Garden, he was given a Testament in his own language. He went West and prospered, and now sends his yearly donation that other immigrants may receive like attention. In this way the New York Bible Society extends its work until it has attained national importance.

During May, 1913, over 104,000 immigrants arrived at Ellis island, and 13,643 copies of Scripture were distributed among them. During the same month 323 vessels were visited by the missionary from the marine department and 1,300 volumes disposed of. The missionary among the sailors does more than simply hand out Bibles. He tells the men what that book contains—the story of the Saviour. If a man is attentive, he is given a single gospel—Mattew, Mark, Luke or John. When the missionary sees him again, he has read that and often will ask for another. Thus many sailors have found a friend in the missionary and through his labors have accepted Christ. No one needs the Bible more than the sailor.

A special effort to help the youth of the city has been made by placing Bibles in reading rooms of cheap lodging houses. This followed the placing of Bibles in nearly every hotel of the city, in appreciation of which letters have been received from travelers after returning to their own cities.

There is no more important philanthropic and religious work in its influence upon the life of our country and the world than the Bible distribution maintained here at the greatest portal of the land. It has been carried on without interruption for more than a hundred years.

In order to enlarge this work, and also to insure its permanence, the New York Bible Society is making an appeal for a special endowment fund of $200,000. One hundred and eighty thousand dollars has been secured in cash or reputable pledges. There is lacking $20,000. About $50,000 has been promised on condition that the whole amount shall be raised. "Five thousand dollars will furnish 5,000 immigrants with some portion of the Bible every year through all the future," says Dr. Carter. The society's headquarters are in the Bible House, Astor place, New York City.

Denominations Harmonize in India

Comity and cooperation between different denominations on the foreign mission field has had another remarkable victory in the adjustment just obtained in the united provinces of India between the American Presbyterian and Methodist missions, whose work has overlapped in several sections of that region. In a five-hour session at Cawnpore, where the Christian unity felt and the disposition of self-sacrifice manifested were regarded as singular evidences of the presence of the Holy Spirit, a boundary line was drawn across the country and it was agreed that the Presbyterians should withdraw all their work to one side of the line, while the Methodists confine their efforts to the other.

To accomplish this division of labor and eliminate competition the Presbyterians passed over to the care of the Methodist mission 600 converts, while the Methodists gave the Presbyterians a community in which the Christian population is estimated at 15,000. A joint commission was appointed to appraise all property thus transferred, and a strict financial accounting will be made, in which the mission found to have profited most by the transaction will pay over to the other a cash balance equal to its gains. A commission was named of three members from each part, which it to have full power to adjust any future question that seems to threaten the good relations of the two missions.

Missionaries Praise Secretary White

The missionaries in China in their reports to the board in New York have added new volume to the chorus of praise previously heard from the missionaries in India complimenting the gracious tact with which Secretary White has handled all situations with which he has had to deal as the administrative representative of the board touring the Asiatic fields. According to these reports, Dr. White has had many difficult situations to handle, especially in the adjustment of matters of comity on different fields. But he has not been baffled in any instance, and by his remarkable ability, forbearance and patience, he has cleared up to the satisfaction of all concerned some long standing problems. The native workers as well as missionaries have valued and respected Dr. White's judicial abilities.

Dr. and Mrs. White have returned from China by way of the Siberian railway, and are sailing for home July 5.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was led by Mrs. Hosmer of Central Park church. Letters from Dr. J. M. W. Farnham of Shanghai and Mrs. J. C. Melrose of Nodoa, China, were read by Mrs. Coulter and one from Miss Leavitt of Japan by Miss Herma Clark. Mrs. S. C. Peoples of Siam, the echo of whose minute-and-a-half speech before General Assembly had been heard all the way from Atlanta, told with joy of the decision of the board in New York to grant the Laos mission's request and open a station among the Laos speaking Tai in China's southern border. That it was a woman's gift which served as a key to open that door made her still more jubilant. Prayer was offered for the summer conference of Westminster Guild, in session at Winona Lake, and for the forward movement in Laos, and for India, Mrs. Berry, Miss Clark and Mrs. Coy leading.

NEW BOOKS

Our age is often called an irreligious—an unideal—age. The truth of the statement may well be doubted. The age is a realistic age. . . . But that the age is averse to religious life and faith where they have the ring of reality, it would indeed be difficult to show. Men cannot so easily escape their own natures and the grip of their own birthright.—Henry C. King.

Problems of Philosophy

What Is New Thought? by Charles Brodie Patterson. Unlike Christian Science, mental science has no official textbook. Every one of its adherents is at liberty to present his own interpretation of the system. Yet the works of the leading mental scientists very closely resemble one another. It seems as though the very absence of a recognized formulated standard of creed prevents the emergence of radical differences among them. Be that as it may, Dr. Patterson says nothing here which he has not already said in some form or other in one of his many books, and which the other leaders of the cult have not repeated in their several works. Their great message is that man has the equipment spiritually, mentally and physically to work out all his problems and to rid himself of all ills by the power of an all-controlling will. This is the substance of Dr. Patterson's work, and, like his other books, is written in a strong and persuasive style. [T. Y. Crowell Company, New York. $1 net.

Man a Machine, by J. O. de la Mettrie. The French and English versions of this famous French philosophical classic have been carefully edited and elucidated by Gertrude Carmen Bussey and issued in a worthy form by the one American publishing house which is not afraid of embarking on the hazardous venture of publishing low-priced books of philosophy. The book is in every respect one for the historical and philosophical student rather than for the general reader. La Mettrie was the most extreme of the French encyclopedists, and his purely materialistic atheism is quite impossible even from the standpoint of those who would today be called unbelievers. [Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago. $2 net.

History of Modern Philosophy, by A. W. Benn. This is a very little volume on a very great and difficult subject. Nevertheless the author has managed to infuse enough concrete interest into the study of the outstanding philosophies of modern times to justify the recommendation of the book to students in general. It should be read, however, not as a just, fair and well balanced estimate of the different systems of philosophy which it aims to sketch but as a source of sidelights on the personalities of the philosophers and occasional brilliant epigrammatic dicta, which, whether one agrees or differs with them, are always a source of enjoyment. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Memory and the Executive Mind, by Arthur Raymond Robinson. The author's purpose is to show how the memory may be developed or improved, and how this is a necessary step toward the production of an efficient mentality —the executive mind—which will enable its possessor to achieve success. The literary quality of the book is not impressive and the suggestions are neither new nor striking; but it is due the author to say that his ideas are practical and his ideals commendable. [M. A. Donahue and Company, Chicago. $1.50 net.

Religious Studies

The Positive Evolution of Religion, by Frederic Harrison. The veteran author of this volume has for many years enjoyed the distinction of being the leader of the Positivist Society of England. Positivism as a religion has made but little progress since the days of its foundation by August Comte in the first half of the nineteenth century. It was not expected that it would even by its most sanguine advocates. It is a religious system claiming scientific validity for all its fundamental articles of belief. It claims to admit of no assumptions of any sort. Metaphysical assumptions in particular are abhorrent to it. And yet in its aim and methods it conforms to the Christian religion and to the Roman Catholic type in particular. Mr. Harrison is not inclined to magnify the features of positivism derived from Catholicism, but takes a broader view, showing its essential connections with fetichism, nature worship, polytheism, Catholicism, Protestantism and deism. He even has a chapter on what he calls Neo-Christianity, i. e., the radical interpretation which eliminates the supernatural element and considers what is left to be the essence of Christianity. Mr. Harrison's discussion throws much light upon the whole problem of religion, but more especially on positivism in the form in which it is now held by its not very numerous devotees. As an apologetic or argument for positivism, however, the work cannot be conceded much strength. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Efficient Religion, by George Arthur Andrews. This book seems to us more satisfactory than Mr. Andrews's earlier work, "What Is Essential." The publishers call it a book for "a frankly utilitarian age." The conclusions of the writer are pragmatic, at least; a religion that "works" is the only one for our age. To make the point that the church has failed to present such a religion, Mr. Andrews puts his argument strongly, even extremely at times. He contends that the unbelief of today is "not of the profound scholar but of the uncomprehending child," that men do not think their unbelief but feel it instead. We trust we do not underestimate so earnest a book when we say that it seems to us to omit the work which Christ does for us and within us, while it accents the work that he does before us, which we are to copy. Christian experience testifies that we are saved by Christ, and not "as" he was saved. The volume does not take much account of the fact that many men find peace in Christ, rather than simply the peace that he found. Even with this under-accenting, the volume is certain to make appeal to earnest hearts. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

Twenty Years of Life, by Thomas Van Ness. Mr. Van Ness is the minister of Second church of Boston, founded in 1649 by the Puritans, which long ago became Unitarian and was the scene of the pastorate of Ralph Waldo Emerson. This volume is made up of sermons (selected by the congregation) which have been preached during twenty years in that church. They are thoughtful studies of many forms of Christian truth, though they seem to miss the final gripping power which would come from magnifying Christ as more than a simple teacher or example—as an authoritative master and sacrificial Saviour. There are many suggestive illustrations throughout the book, which will prove helpful to ministerial readers. [American Unitarian Association. $1 net.

Progress in Christian Culture, by Samuel Charles Black. Dr. Black's earlier book on "Plain Answers to Religious Questions" dealt especially with entering the Christian life. This little volume deals with the development of that life, or growth in grace. Dr. Black discusses the various agencies which are available for progress, such as self-examination, self-control, Bible study, prayer and Sabbath observance. The book bears much evidence of reading and of pastoral experience. [Westminster Press, Philadelphia. 75 cents net.

New Opportunities of the Ministry, by Frederick Lynch. A veritable book for the times and call to strong young men for the future. Dr. Lynch makes it clear that the very things which make the present work of the ministry look difficult, as compared with the past, are its especial warrant and glory. On the basis of these pressing problems and difficulties, he appeals to the young men of today. He suggests no solution for the problems. He urges instead that the need for solution offers the right men their supreme opportunity. If you know a strong young man in college, or fresh from it, or even in the high school grade, who wants the biggest chance in life, send him a copy of this book, as an appeal to consider the ministry. Dr. Hugh Black, in his introduction, quotes Phillips Brooks as saying, shortly before his death, that the next twenty years would offer greater opportunity for the Christian minister than any other like period in history. Dr. Lynch proves that Phillips Brooks was right. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 75 cents net.

Preaching and Pastoral Care, by A. C. A. Hall. A suggestive little book, the twenty-third from the good bishop of Vermont. He is so much a churchman that his emphasis on confession and the priestly character of the minister will not meet immediate response from all his readers, and his references are very largely confined to Episcopal sources. But for all that the volume will be helpful to men who are ready to have their work set before them anew in clear and distinct form. There are helpful hints given throughout on courses of sermons or addresses or prayer meeting studies. [Longmans, Green and Company, New York. $1.

The Way Made Plain, by James H. Brookes is a new edition of a small volume containing twenty studies upon sin and redemption. It is in fact an exposition of the first part of the tenth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. No one familiar with Dr. Brookes's methods needs to be told that the chapters contain a system of theology. [American Sunday School Union, Philadelphia.

Miscellaneous

Steamship Conquest of the World, by Frederick A. Talbot. This volume will be a revelation to the reader unfamiliar with the building, launching and navigation of the great ocean-going steamships. The introductory chapter tells interestingly the development of the modern liner from Fulton's little steamboat of a century ago; other chapters show with some detail the methods of construction which produce the present-day monsters, and describe their launching and trial trips, their luxuriousness, and the perils they encounter. "Steamship Surgery" is the suggestive caption under which are told the remarkable achievements in repairing shattered hulls, and the "wireless" is not overlooked. The photographic illustrations are good and plentiful. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.50 net.

Himself, by E. B. Lowry. Just at the present time there is a flood of books on sexual questions. Some of them are good, others are bad, and others may seem to be indifferent, but probably are harmful. Dr. Lowry's work seems to us a thoroughly wholesome, right-minded attempt to tell men the truth about themselves in a commendable way. We have looked through it carefully, finding things to commend and nothing that seems to us in any way deserving of adverse criticism. [Forbes and Company, Chicago. $1 net.

Heroines of Modern Progress, by Elmer C. Adams and Warren Dunn Foster. A most wholesome book for girls, exalting only Christian character and high steadfast fidelity to Christian ideals. Mary Lyon, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Julia Ward Howe, Frances E. Willard and Jane Addams are some of the names in the list which indicate the sort of character these authors choose to hold up for the inspiration of girls whose life is in the making. [Sturgis and Walton Company, New York. $1.50.

The Writer's Desk Book: A Reference Volume Upon Questions of Punctuation, Capitalization, Spelling, Division of Words, Indention, Spacing, Italics, Abbreviations, Accents, Numerals, Faulty Diction, Letter Writing, Postal Regulations, etc., by William Dana Orcutt. This is one of the most comprehensive little volumes of its kind ever published. [F. A. Stokes Company, New York. 60 cents net.

Sunday Suppers, by Alice Laidlaw Williams; with decorations by Lancing Smith. Here are fifty-four chafing-dish recipes, old and new, each embodied in a delightful Sunday supper menu. This little volume is really stimulating in its fresh resourcefulness. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1 net.

The Open Hearth

Some Prohibition Developments

Congressman Hobson has again introduced in Congress his bill "to prohibit forever in the United States the sale, the manufacture for sale and the importation for sale of all liquors containing alcohol."

The same month Secretary William Shaw of the United Societies of Christian Endeavor, at a mass meeting in Boston, took this pledge: "God helping me, no party that is not openly pledged to the destruction of the liquor traffic can have my vote." And he added: "If this makes a third party man of me it will be because no old party has the moral courage to tackle the problem which economists say wastes money; which scientists say destroys the body; which statesmen say corrupts politics; which moralists say debauches morals; which God says damns the soul." A few weeks later he petitioned for a million Christian voters to take the pledge with him. The national Christian Endeavor Society has gone into national prohibition with a vim, with Ohio's Daniel A. Poling as leader. Why hang back? The saloonkeepers chuckle and know their business is safe as long as Christian (?) men vote the same ticket as saloonkeepers.

If laboring men join the I. W. W. and raise even a little riot they are promptly jailed and bitterly denounced by saint and sinner. But the combined votes of same saint and sinner send "Liberty League" brewers to Congress.

Local option may have had a place as an educational feature for the frail-hearted males who feared to "utterly destroy the giants"; but its usefulness is past. Last week a snake ran across my path. With one hard whack I completely severed its caudal appendage; but the snake wriggled away much more alive than before I hit it. How like unto local option! Let's hit the snake on the other end.

An "Honor Roll" for Churches

From time to time I have noticed churches reporting for the year larger amounts of money raised for benevolences than for congregational expenses, as in your issue of May 8 by Market Square church of Harrisburg and Mount Airy church, John Calhoun, D. D., pastor.

Following the idea carried out by the banking fraternity of an "honor roll," where each bank accumulating a surplus equal to its capital stock is placed, I propose that the Presbyterian Church have an "honor roll," where the name of each church and Sunday school raising in a single year an amount for benevolences equal to the amount raised for its congregational expenses shall be placed, and suggest that The Continent publish this "honor roll," carrying it in each issue through the following year.

Would not the sight of these illustrious names stimulate other churches and Sunday schools to "go and do likewise," adding their names to this glorious band?

Baptist Men Force Saloons to Close

The Continent's recent editorial paragraph apropos of the Cleveland Baptist brotherhood and its war on the Sunday saloon is high praise, but stopped a step short. The truth is, our Baptist friends have won a complete victory. Adventurous souls among the saloonkeepers still keep open here and there, but agents of the brotherhood keep the city scoured, and violators of the law are being arrested and convicted with beautiful and most gratifying regularity. Their lawyers are advising them to plead guilty and throw themselves on the mercy of the court. They are doing it, too.

The great achievement of the brotherhood was in trying out the various channels of prosecution possible under the law until it found the right one. It was proved impossible to secure convictions by means of our Cleveland police courts, and the brotherhood finally took its cases before Mayor McQuigg of East Cleveland, a stanch member of the U. P. Church, and here the guilty have been so sure of swift conviction and punishment that Cleveland has awakened to the novel discovery that its saloons not only can be but undoubtedly are closed on Sunday. The city authorities meanwhile have looked on with surprise and, I should think, secret chagrin. They told us it could not be done. All praise to the Baptist brotherhood.

CHARLES L. ZORBAUGH.

"Tell It Not in Gath"

I read with deep interest and, generally, with great admiration the columns of The Continent. But may I call attention to what seems to me an indiscretion on the part of many Christian writers and speakers.

The church, especially that portion that writes and speaks much for public print, has too much to say about the difficulties it faces and not enough about its Christ and the glorious opportunities of service. For some years now, in public conference and private, the conspicuous theme has been "problems"; they were the "problems of the city and the city church," the "problems of the rural church," the "problem of holding the young people," the "problem of reaching the masses." There has been much said about the "church facing a crisis" and "the age of transition." All this sounds as if something had gone seriously wrong, as if the church had lost its hold on affairs and had not been able yet to lay a mastering hand on conditions. Such harping on the minor strings cannot be sweet music to the ear of Christ in heaven. It cannot be very encouraging and inspiring to those who have just taken their church vows and laid their hands on the plow. It does not ring sufficiently with the heroic, nor does it constitute a call to the unconverted.

We are not blind to the conditions that have been labeled "problems"; but they are not new, save perhaps as to form; they are as old as the church itself. If the church will meet all of them successfully in the next decade, they will reappear in different forms unto the end of time. Of course things don't stay put. If the church would be always an efficient minister and messenger in the name of Christ, it must change the form, and often the place, of its activities. It poorly becomes the church to sing only when the work is easy, and lament when it is hard. The greatness of its Lord, and the greatness of the possible achievements through him, should fill the heart with rejoicing.

If it be true that there are not many taken captive for Christ, that many young men from Christian homes and colleges turn their backs on the puplit, that many children from Christian homes do not make a profession of faith, may it not be due, in part, to the whining of the church? The publication of the "problems" of the church, which often are only problems of one man or congregation, in Gath and in the streets of Askelon has not helped to strengthen the church but has caused the daughters of the Philistines to rejoice. Let the church give the shout of battle and sing the songs of victory, of which there are so many.

Suggestions for Labor Sunday

The commission on the church and social service of the Federal Council has named Aug. 31 as Labor Sunday. For those pastors who do not return until after that date the first or second Sunday of September is suggested. A pamphlet of suggestions for the observance of this day may be obtained from the secretary, 1611 Clarendon building, 215 4th avenue, New York City.

Gettysburg Fifty Years Ago —and Today

Today there are multitudes of folk who are paying a pilgrimage to Gettysburg. They have come from the North and the South, the East and the West. Old veterans are there, maimed and battle scarred. Three hundred and fifty Boy Scouts, chosen by the State of Pennsylvania as aids de camp to the old heroes, are there. The bodies of the sacred dead lie buried there. The spirit of Lincoln is there, and the echo of his immortal message surges forth today. Truly the heroes of Gettysburg did not live and die in vain.

Shall the Soldiers of the Cross be forgotten, the heroes of "peace that hath its victories no less renowned than war"? Does the Minister of the Gospel, who serves his country as a civilizing, upbuilding factor, deserve less than grateful recognition and cheerful assistance in the day of his old age?

Do it before he dies! Put your wreath of fading flowers on the graves of the soldiers who have died, but put your arm of help and sympathy about the soldier who is fainting under the burden of old age and adversity. While a united nation is remembering Gettysburg and honoring its noble men of old—O Church, remember Calvary and "all the saints who from their labors rest," and do not forget the surviving veterans of the Cross, the desolate widows and the defenseless orphans!

My advice to parties with topfeed furnaces is: Unless you have money to burn, buy the UNDERFEED."

Let us send you names and cheerful testimony of thousands who KNOW Underfeed worth.

Sensible Coal Burning Way!—In the Underfeed coal is pumped up into the fire pot from underneath the fire and like a candle burns from the top down, which insures perfect combustion and thus even heat.

Heat from Waste!—Smoke and gases (40 to 50% of the heat units in coal) wasted up Topfeed chimneys, must pass up through the flames, are entirely consumed and make more heat. Here's where another saving comes in.

Always Clean!—The fire, always on top, is in close contact with clean, heat-responsive metal. Therefore no soot-covered, hard-to-clean, heat-retarding surfaces. No clinkers. Few ashes. Requires less attention than other heaters.

Ways of Working

Summer the Time to Plan

Definite plans are being made now by the officers of many Sunday schools of the country looking toward the successful prosecution of that branch of church work with the opening of aggressive church activity in the fall. In some city churches where a large proportion of the membership goes to the country during the vacation season very little can be done with Sunday school now. It has been found, however, by the officers of these schools that if they lay their plans for Rally Day before the 1st of July they are more likely to have a successful school early next year than if they wait until the pupils return in September. These summer plans for fall work comprise shifting of teachers, reorganization of departments, the procuring of new teachers and scholars. Last year Evanston (Ill.) First church evolved a plan of coupon invitation, whereby a section of a ticket was detached and the recipient's name written on it. This was deposited by him on Rally Day and enabled the officers thus to obtain the names of a considerable number of additional adherents to the school.

Portland Presbytery has recently adopted a comprehensive plan for Sunday school work to be done soon. September will be known as Sunday school month and pastors have been requested to preach a sermon on the relation of the school to the church and to devote a prayer meeting to the same subject. An educational survey will be made of each church during the summer and house-to-house visitation in each church community is planned. Similar work is being undertaken by churches in other cities of the country.

Putting Endeavorers to Work

Endeavor societies in various parts of the country get considerable practice in actual Christian work during summer season by conducting one or more of the church services while the pastor is on his vacation. The evening service especially is often turned over to the young people. A member of the society speaks or the regular program of the Endeavor meeting is carried out, the older people being invited to participate. The society at Winter Haven, Fla., is thus taking charge of the evening service during the absence of the pastor, Rev. E. G. McLean.

Gives Special Report from Assembly

Rev. S. G. Livingston of Lapeer, Mich., gave members of his congregation a report of the action of General Assembly soon after that body adjourned by means of the complete summary of Assembly proceedings which The Continent published. Many pastors from time to time find similar uses for information in this paper.

Useful Sunday School Report Ready

After a serious delay on account of the floods at Dayton, Ohio, the printed minutes of the third annual meeting of the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations for the United States and Canada are at last available. This contains the complete findings of the council, representing twenty-nine denominations, touching such matters as Sunday school standards, exhibits, lesson courses and summer schools for Sunday school workers. The statistical table shows that in ten of the denominations the Sunday school enrollment exceeds the total number of communicants by 5 to 50 per cent. In the remaining nineteen denominations the number of communicants exceeds the Sunday school enrollment by percentages varying from 8 to 130. Pastors and Sunday school workers can obtain the report by sending their application, accompanied by 10 cents in stamps, to the secretary, Henry H. Meyer, 150 5th avenue, New York.

Junior Republics Multiplying

The national association of Junior Republics, which has developed from the work of W. G. George in the famous George Junior at Freeville, N. Y., has arranged to turn that institution into a sort of training school, where workers will be instructed how to develop similar institutions in other localities. There is intense interest throughout the country in this method of dealing with more or less unruly boys and girls, and in many places there is money ready to start a Junior Republic if the proper leadership can be found. The national association hopes to launch two new republics next fall, which will make the total number ten in this country. Harold Large, who has gone to England, has just opened in Dorset, on the estate of the earl of Sandwich, a Junior Republic which is known as the "Little Commonwealth," the first enterprise of the sort in the British isles.

clothes and go in bathing. The stream widens into a pool a bit beyond."

"Hurrah!" "Goody!" "Oh—h—h!" And in a minute or two the three children were as ready for the water as Philip, who did not have to change his clothes.

Such fun! They romped and dog-paddled and skipped pebbles for Philip. Mother's call to luncheon surprised them all—then they were surprised to find out how hungry they were.

At sight of the "table" the children shouted. Right in the middle of the white tablecloth was a lovely flag! To be sure it was not very big —just the size of mother's gingerbread pan— and it hadn't as many stars and stripes as there are in a real flag; but, as Dick said, it "looked too good to eat, and too good not to." Tiny stars of white frosting were laid in one corner on a blue paper field, and the stripes were of red and white frosting—the red colored with beet juice—and underneath all was a real Fourth of July cake!

"I'm sure I felt a good deal like Betsy Ross when I undertook the making of that flag," laughed mother.

After luncheon, when the chicken sandwiches and other goodies that mother brought had disappeared, the "perfeckly scrumptious" flag was cut and each one had a "stripe." Then all helped in clearing up, and while mother rested daddy told the children what their colors meant.

"Red stands for courage, blue is for truth and white means purity"; and he told them stories of men and women who were brave and true and pure, ending with a fairy story for Peggy's own self.

All at once daddy jumped to his feet.

"Why, why, Sir Red! Prithee, I 'most forgot! Run to yonder tree and there, under sheltering bough, behold! in your own color, an offering sent from far-off land."

Dick ran as fast as his legs would carry him, and from under a tree, where it had been hidden by a wrap of mother's, he drew a knobby brown parcel. Eager fingers pulled at the string, until daddy took pity and cut it with his pocket knife. Out fell—oh, what do you think? A great bunch of bright red firecrackers! And then such fizzing, whizzing and banging, until the last firecracker had been shot off, and a tired, happy little party went home to bread and milk and bed!

"Such a lovely make-believe day!" sighed Dorothy.

"Great," said Dick; "but it would have been awful hard to make believe firecrackers."

"Good night, my Red, White and Blue," said mother, as she kissed the children on cheeks, forehead and blue eyes and tucked them into bed. Peggy was already fast asleep dreaming that the robins and bluebirds were trying to make a flag of their feathers, but couldn't get enough white for the stripes.

School and College

Parsons College at its recent commencement conferred the degree of LL. D. on Dr. A. S. Carrier of McCormick Seminary.

The commencement exercises of West Nottingham Academy, Colora, Md., were held June 5. Charles L. Mead, D. D., pastor of First M. E. church of Baltimore, delivered the commencement address. Rev. DeWitt M. Benham, pastor of Central church, Baltimore, preached the baccalaureate sermon on the preceding Sunday. A movement is afoot to have the school property, valued at $20,000, transferred to Baltimore Synod and operated as a synodical collegiate institute.

Knox College commencement June 8 to 12 closed a most successful year. The baccalaureate sermon was by President McClelland. On alumni evening Judge Merritt W. Pinckney, '83, of the Cook county juvenile court, gave an address on some phases of the work at his court. Commencement day a class of sixty-four was graduated. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on Judge Pinckney. Announcement was made that Mrs. J. T. McKnight will add $60,777 to the $25,000 given by her late husband to complete the gift of George Davis science hall, named after Mrs. McKnight's father, who served the college many years as treasurer.

Commencement exercises of Blackburn College were concluded June 11. The address was delivered by Rev. George T. Gunter, pastor of Second church, Springfield, Ill. The degree of D. D. was conferred on the speaker of the morning and on Rev. William H. Fulton, pastor of First church, Clinton, Ill. President Hudson announced that the College Board had made an appropriation of $2,000 for improving the plant on condition that the balance of the $10,000 required for that purpose be obtained. The announcement was also made that this left only $2,000 to be raised, and without any appeal friends of the college began rising in the audience and making contributions. Over $1,200 was pledged.

Jamestown College has closed its fourth year and graduated its first class from the college of liberal arts, five in number. Dr. Henry C. Swearingen delivered the commencement address. There were nineteen graduates in all departments. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon Rev. John T. Faris, editorial manager of the Board of Publication; Rev. J. S. Boyd, Fargo, N. D., and Rev. G. Sumner Baskerville, Malcom, Iowa, president of the college in 1893, when it closed. The marked feature of commencement was the laying of the corner stone of Taber hall, the gift of a loyal friend of the college, and named by request of the donor for H. M. Taber, chairman of the trustees. Two of the graduates will enter the seminary this fall to prepare for the ministry.

Excessive heat did not deter a great crowd from assembling to hear the baccalaureate address of President Blaisdell at Alma College commencement and the magnificent chorus which Professor Veach had trained. The oratorio of Elijah was given during the week by the great chorus. Thursday was unveiled a tablet in memory of A. W. Wright by his little granddaughter, Miss Lila Lancashire. Mr. Wright was the great benefactor of the college and its constant friend. He gave to it hundreds of thousands of dollars and inspired others to give. The original plant with its campus was entirely his gift. Wright hall is his lasting monument. Instead of the orations by the graduates an address was delivered by C. A. Lippincott, D. D., South Bend, Ind., a trustee. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon three Michigan pastors: J. B. Clark, Detroit; J. A. Dunkel, Saginaw, and A. W. Johnstone, Cadillac. Dr. E. A. Bagley has resigned from the trustees and Professor Jay Clizbe, after twenty years of service, has resigned from the faculty.

La Verne Noyes of Chicago has promised $300,000 to the University of Chicago for a building to be used as a social center and gymnasium for the women of that institution.

June 12 Lenox College closed the fifty-sixth commencement. The treasurer's report showed assets of the institution to be nearly five times as great as a half dozen years ago. The baccalaureate sermon was by President E. E. Reed; the sermon before the Christian associations by H. W. Reherd, D. D., of Waterloo. W. S. Plumer Bryan, D. D., of Chicago gave the commencement address. A class of twenty-five was graduated.

Washington (D. C.) Pastor Goes West

Dr. Donald C. McLeod

General regret is expressed in Washington, D. C., over the announcement by Dr. Donald C. McLeod that he had accepted the call of First church, Springfield, Ill., and would begin work there in September. Dr. McLeod went to Washington from Meadville, Pa., fourteen years ago. During that time the membership of First church has increased from 250 to 800 and the Sunday school from 100 to 950. He has been vigorous in his efforts to aid the forces of civic righteousness, specially for better legislation. During the past winter he was present nearly every day at the hearings on the Jones-Works excise bill for the District of Columbia and took part in the hearings on the Webb liquor bill and the Kenyon abatement bill. He has been president of the District of Columbia Anti-Saloon League and is now an officer of the international reform bureau, the international moral and social commission and member of the moderator's council of Washington City Presbytery. The church which he leaves met in 1795 in the carpenter shop of the White House and later in the basement of the capitol. The corner stone of the present building was laid in 1827. Secretary Bryan attends this church.

Light on Latin-American Problems

The valuable papers and discussions of the conference on missions in Latin America held in New York March 12 and 13 are being published in pamphlet form. The conference was held under the auspices of the committee of reference and council of the foreign missions conference of North America. The papers, discussions and findings will present the Latin American problems in the strongest light yet given. They aim at the solution of one of the most critical problems of modern missions. All who are in any way interested in the work in Latin American countries will need the pamphlet, which will be furnished at cost, namely, 20 cents a copy. Address Rev. Orville Reed, 156 5th avenue, New York City.

Plan Survey of San Francisco

A ministerial committee consisting of W. K. Howe, Alexander Eakin, C. S. Tanner, W. E. Parker, Jr., and W. Nat. Friend has been appointed to prepare for a social and evangelistic survey of the city on the part of the Presbyterian churches.

Doctors W. S. Holt of Portland and George C. Butterfield recently addressed presbytery on home mission and Sunday school needs of the city.

R. F. Coyle, D. D., of Denver preached the first sermon in the newly built First church of Oakland July 2.

The Rockhurst conference for prayer at Mill Valley, June 16-22, drew a large attendance. Such names as H. H. McQuilkin, D. D.; Freeman D. Bovard, D. D.; J. A. Fraser, M. Collins Jones; E. R. Willis, D. D.; Warren C. Sherman and W. K. Howe were on the program at this annual gathering on the north shore.

Oklahoma

Plans were recently made at a meeting of boy workers of First church, Oklahoma City, for a trip by Boy Scouts over the route taken by Washington Irving on his visit to Oklahoma in 1832. It was planned that the boys would mark the old Irving trail under auspices of the Oklahoma Historical Society.

The new $10,000 brick church at Atoka was dedicated June 8. A large increase in the membership and a doubling of the Sunday school attendance forced the congregation from the building built in 1887 to a larger structure. Rev. L. W. Scudder is pastor. The church has five classrooms in addition to the main room for Sunday school, and in the basement has social rooms and kitchen. Dr. Frederick W. Hawley, president of Kendall College, Tulsa, delivered the dedicatory sermon.

Wisconsin

Rev. J. W. Laughlin of Janesville has resigned, but the resignation has not been accepted.

Paul Johnson, son of Rev. Oliver C. Johnson and a graduate of Carroll College, will take up the mission work at Rothschild and Kelly for the ensuing year.

First Presbyterian church, Beaver Dam, celebrated its seventieth anniversary recently. Addresses were made by Rev. L. H. Shock, the pastor; Rev. W. B. Macneil of Horicon, Rev. T. S. Johnson and others.

Ohio

At its recent commencement Franklin College, New Athens, conferred the degree of D. D. on Rev. William L. Barrett, '97, pastor of First church, Bellefontaine.

The fourth anniversary of the pastorate of Rev. A. J. Funnell was recently observed at Norwalk. The church membership has been increased to 400 and $14,000 has been expended on the building.

Memorial services for Dr. E. Trumbull Lee, for seven years pastor of Second church, Cincinnati, were held in the Church of the Covenant in that city June 22. The principal address was made by Dr. Charles Frederick Goss.

A series of seven vesper services was recently held in Third church, Springfield, Rev. John Newell pastor, with sermons by various ministers of the city. The Lutheran pastor spoke on Martin Luther, the Methodist minister on John Wesley. In like manner John Calvin, Henry Ward Beecher, Charles H. Spurgeon, Phillips Brooks and "Liberal Judaism" were discussed, with explanation of the denominational doctrines of each church as the speaker desired.

Tennessee

Plans are being made for a new church building at Sneedville, Hancock county. The work has grown steadily in the past two years, necessitating the building of a church. Ten years ago a church was sold for a high school.

Kirkwood, the youngest of the Presbyterian churches in Knoxville, has outgrown its chapel and is now building a substantial small church to cost $3,000. The officers expect to occupy the building about Aug. 1. Licentiate H. J. Wilson is supplying the congregation.

New Mexico

Pecos Valley Presbytery has opened new work in Lincoln county and has appointed Rev. S. M. Johnson missionary to this important field.

Santa Fe Presbytery has been called to meet at Las Vegas for the examination and licensure of Messrs. Lucero and Fitzgerald, recent graduates of McCormick Seminary. Mr. Lucero will have charge of Mexican work at Raton and Mr. Fitzgerald will be sent as missionary to the Navajo Indians in San Juan county.

West Virginia

The visit of Vice-President Thomas R. Marshall to Berkeley Springs recently was made the occasion of a special service, when Mr. Marshall gave an address, "The Man of Galilee," in the local church, of which Rev. A. D. Sutherland is pastor. Mr. Marshall also spoke at the open air patriotic service and he and Mrs. Marshall were the guests of honor at a large reception.

Missouri

Plans are being considered by Presbyterians of Missouri for the establishment of a girls' college at Liberty. The citizens of that town have pledged $40,000 and the Presbytery of Upper Missouri of the Southern Church has invited Kansas City Presbytery to cooperate. A committee was appointed to consider the proposition.

Massachusetts

First church, Newburyport, gave its pastor, Rev. A. M. Paterson, a month's vacation and a purse of $100 to enable him to attend the Assembly meetings at Atlanta, and visit other southern localities. While at Atlanta he had the privilege of handing to Moderator Stone the gavel that had been made by request of

BANISHED

Coffee Finally Had to Go

The way some persons cling to coffee, even after they know it is doing them harm, is a puzzler. But it is an easy matter to give it up for good when Postum is properly made and used instead. A girl writes:

"Mother had been suffering with nervous headaches for seven weary years, but kept on drinking coffee.

"One day I asked her why she did not give up coffee, as a cousin of mine had done who had taken to Postum. But mother was such a slave to coffee she thought it would be terrible to give it up.

"Finally, one day, she made the change to Postum, and quickly her headaches disappeared. One morning while she was drinking Postum so freely and with such relish, I asked for a taste.

"That started me on Postum and I now drink it more freely than I did coffee, which never comes into our house now."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for booklet, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms.

Regular Postum (must be boiled).

Instant Postum (doesn't require boiling, but is prepared instantly by stirring a level teaspoonful in an ordinary cup of hot water, which makes it right for most persons.

A big cup requires more and some people who like strong things put in a heaping spoonful and temper it with a large supply of cream.

Experiment until you know the amount that pleases your palate and have it served that way in the future.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Colorado

During the pastorate of Rev. W. S. Crozier at Durango the benevolences of the church increased several hundred per cent. This is the strongest Protestant congregation in the inland empire of the San Juan.

Fraser church was dedicated by the pastor, Rev. A. A. Fonken, assisted by the pastor-evangelist, Rev. C. K. Powell, June 15. It cost $2,500 and is adapted in style and equipment to the needs of a combined lumber camp and ranching community. With the aid of the Board of Church Erection it is paid for. The church membership is twenty in a town of 150.

The church building at Orchard, eighty miles northeast of Denver, was dedicated June 22. The pastor, Rev. Bert F. Mitchell, was assisted by the Sabbath school missionary, W. S. Schureman, and the pastor-evangelist. The entire amount needed to complete was secured before the dedicatory service, $1,850. Mr. Mitchell has in connection with Orchard Weldona and Goodrich, rural points.

At Sunday school conventions recently held at Grand Junction, Rocky Ford and Greeley, the report of a commission on a course of Bible study to be given in connection with the high schools of the state was received. It is suggested that the committees of the state teachers' association and the state Sunday school association prepare a syllabus of a four years' Bible study course to be accredited as a part of the regular course at high school. The courses may be given in the Sunday schools and examinations held on uniform blanks. The Sunday school association is organizing a system of graded training schools in the larger cities in order to provide adequate preparation for teachers of these courses.

Minnesota

Rushmore church recently laid the corner stone of the new building with appropriate services. The pastor is Rev. James Wray.

W. H. Stewart, a middler from Princeton Seminary, supplies a large and needy mission territory for the summer, with Lincoln as a center.

A neat and comfortable house of worship was dedicated at Lincoln recently. Reverends H. McHenry, T. M. Findley and B. P. Holt, the retiring pastor, took part in the services.

The congregation of First church, Sandstone, has determined to begin this summer the erection of a modern stone church building to cost about $10,000. Rev. O. L. Pride came to this church from New Jersey in May.

Rev. A. B. Keeler of Worthington is also supplying Brewster church Sunday afternoons. From Brewster he goes to a schoolhouse appointment before returning to Worthington for the evening service. He travels about thirty miles and preaches four times.

Single day country life institutes were held at Donnelly, Lewiston and Whitefield June 24-26. Music was by a men's missionary quartet and addresses were given in each place by Rev. L. W. Gade, pastor at Willmar; J. E. Napp, under promise as missionary to China; Judge O. H. Campbell of Litchfield and others.

Kansas

Rev. L. E. Humphrey of Hoxie has been elected probate judge and is now dispensing both the law and the gospel.

Highland Presbytery met at Horton church June 16 to ordain Howell P. Lair, a graduate of Emporia College and McCormick Seminary. He has spent three years as instructor in the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut, and goes as missionary to Hainan, China, early in September. He will be supported by Horton church, of which he has been a member since boyhood days.

The church at Russell has met with the loss of one of its oldest and most honored members in the death of Judge Eastland.

The new church at Ellsworth is approaching completion. It will be one of the most complete and convenient edifices in the synod.

The congregation at Manhattan has decided to build a new church. The present structure was erected in 1870 and will be torn town.

Newton church has the model men's Bible class in the state. Forty men gather every Sabbath morning under the tutorship of the pastor, J. B. McCuish, D. D.

Since Jan. 1 the Sunday school of Holton church has increased its enrollment 30 per cent and the Christian Endeavor has more than doubled its membership. Rev. S. A. Fulton is now in his fourth year as pastor.

Services are held on the church lawn at Geneseo during the warm weather. The pastor, Rev. R. L. Price, has recently organized a Sunday school at Crawford with fifty-one enrolled the first Sabbath. He will preach there twice a month.

First church, Halstead, which supports a foreign minister in Korea, shows in its annual report that during the seven years of the pastorate of Dr. John Milton Oliver the benevolences of the church have shown a gain of over $9 a member.

Professor William A. McKeever of the state agricultural college at Manhattan has issued the ninth of his series of home training bulletins. This is devoted to the means of employment of a boy during vacation and gives a description of some of the various sorts of work which a boy may do during the summer without interfering with the playtime which he should have.

The formal opening of the new church of Winfield took place June 8. The Sabbath school met as usual at the old church, which has been used for thirty-six years, and after a short devotional service led by Rev. H. V. Clark of Mulvane the school marched to the new home, a block away, with the primary department leading. As the front of the column entered the new church the rear had just left the old. The preaching services were deeply interesting.

The thirty-fifth anniversary of the organization of Dodge City church was recently observed. There were thirteen charter members. The present building was the first independent church in Dodge City. It has been enlarged four different times. For the last five years there has been an average annual accession of fifty-nine members, or more than one member for every Sabbath for five consecutive years. The pastor is Rev. J. C. Berger. The question of a new church building is being agitated.

Michigan

Rev. R. A. Atwood of Paterson, N. J., was recently appointed superintendent of Sunday school work for Michigan and arrived June 25 in Saginaw, where he will reside.

An impressive feature of the Children's Day service at Deckerville church was the baptism of four children and their mothers. In one instance grandmother, mother and child received the rite.

During the past year three Y. M. C. A. secretaries have been employed in Oriental lands by the Detroit association and this year it is proposed to add a fourth at a total cost of $8,000, of which $6,000 was pledged at a recent luncheon and the balance is assured.

Rev. William H. Mason, pastor at Alma, has greatly strengthened the prayer meeting by giving students, professors and others topics to discuss after special preparation; by taking a whole book of the Bible, breaking it up into sections and taking one section for each meeting, and by providing special music. Just now he is providing an athletic field for the young people of the Sunday school. With his own hands he has leveled and fenced a tennis

SCHOOL
of Chicago
for Christian Workers
Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

Don't miss that line "for Christian Workers." That's what the Presbyterian School is for—to train Christion Workers.

A Christian Worker is one who works for Christ.

Personal acquaintance with Him and such admiration for His plans and ambitions as lead to a passion to help Him, to work for Him and under His guidance, must be the result of our training or we fail.

A Church Worker is one who works the Church.

If we send out only those who can do the work of the Church, or whose ambition it is to work for the Church, our product is not all it ought to be.

To equip Christian workers who shall bring to the pastor's aid knowledge of methods and ability to handle and put people to work is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School.

We want to correspond with women whom God is inclining to take up such work and with people who want to help them.

field, provided swings and teeter boards, and electric lights, so that the grounds can be used in the evening.

Rev. E. A. Junkin, who was recently installed at Alpena, has been able to regenerate three smaller churches in that vicinity, obtaining pulpit supplies and organizing Sunday schools. He has done much to strengthen Presbyterianism in and around Alpena and Royston.

A Presbyterian mission has been opened at Roberts hall in East Detroit, with preaching services every Sunday morning and evening. A Sunday school was organized on Easter, and on Children's Day, June 8, over 100 were present. Rev. Alexander Danskin, formerly with The Michigan Presbyterian, has charge of the work.

Henry Root Austin, aged 80, who had been an elder in Monroe church for twenty-nine years, died June 11. Mr. Austin was born in Michigan and seriously injured in a railway wreck during the civil war. He was in the United States railway mail service for thirty years and was not only one of the oldest employees but one of the most proficient. He was a Sunday school teacher for a quarter of a century.

New Jersey

Rev. Charles N. Thomas, pastor of West Park church, Newark, gave a new interpretation to "In prison and ye came unto me" by carrying his stereopticon to the Essex county penitentiary, where 800 prisoners saw California pictures. It was the first time that such an entertainment had been allowed in the institution.

The Kilburn Memorial church, Newark, was dedicated June 22 and several services of thanksgiving and felicitation followed during the week. Dr. W. Y. Chapman of Roseville Avenue church preached the dedication sermon and Rev. R. M. Ramsey, Newport, Pa., Kilburn's first pastor, was present Tuesday evening. Rev. Smith Ordway is pastor.

Plans for the celebration of the 175th anniversary of New Brunswick Presbytery at New Brunswick Sept. 23 were recently adopted. Invitations will be sent to presbyteries which at one time were part of the territory included in New Brunswick—Monmouth, New York, Elizabeth, Westchester, Morris and Orange, Newton, Lehigh, Philadelphia North, Philadelphia and West Jersey.

At the semicentennial celebration of Munn Avenue church, East Orange, it was noted as a matter hard for recent comers to realize that the present imposing church edifice of the congregation is the original home built for it immediately after its organization. But the building has been three times enlarged, and its walls faced with brown stone, so that it bears little resemblance today to its original self.

Presbyterians of Glassboro dedicated recently a chapel on the newly developed Chestnut Ridge tract to replace the old house of worship in the town proper. It is an ornamental structure, finished on the exterior in white stucco. In the special services held Dr. A. P. Botsford, stated clerk of West Jersey Presbytery; Rev. R. H. Gage of Wenonah and Elder H. D. Moore of Hoddenfield spoke. Rev. James M. Hunting is pastor.

Iowa

Samuel Conybeare, D. D., of Central Park church, Cedar Rapids, was given a reception by his church on June 12, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ordination to the gospel ministry. All his pastorates have been in Iowa.

S. Hall Young, D. D., the pioneer missionary to Alaska and an intimate friend of the pastor, Dr. C. F. Ensign, delivered his lecture on the needs and opportunities of Alaska at Marion church June 15.

Dr. Shailer Mathews, Dr. Camden M. Coburn of Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa.; Dr. I. T. Headland of China, Dr. Louis M. Sweet and Rev. M. B. McNutt of New York City will be among the speakers at the summer Bible conference in Cedar Rapids July 20 to 30. Members of Coe College faculty will also lecture.

Evangelist C. E. Hillis and party closed a six weeks' union tabernacle revival campaign in Fort Madison June 1. It was said to be the most solid and far-reaching revival that Fort Madison has ever known. One of the features of the campaign was a Sunday school parade, with over 1,000 persons in line. All the seven churches uniting received a splendid list of converts.

Iowa Synod has recently purchased a home for the use of the university pastor. It will serve as a center of influence for the 400 young men and women from Presbyterian homes who attend the state university. Dr. E. A. Bess of Clinton, as announced by The Continent last week, will be university pastor, succeeding Dr. Francis M. Fox, now associate secretary of the national brotherhood.

Dr. E. A. Bess

The Iowa Christian Endeavor convention was held at Cedar Rapids June 24-27, with a large representation from all parts of the state. President William Hardcastle led the convention enthusiastically. Dr. Orvis of Dubuque, reporting as superintendent of Bible study, showed the practical work being done for boys and girls in many churches in acquainting them with the Bible. Chaplain Pickworth of the reformatory at Anamosa says the drug habit is increasing at a rapid rate among the criminal classes. One of the greatest addresses was that on Wednesday evening by Rev. Joseph K. Greene, who has spent fifty-four years in Turkey. He told how the medical and surgical work had opened doors hitherto locked to the missionary. The forenoons were given to conference work. Dr. H. W. Reherd of Waterloo made two addresses.

South Dakota

The services of Rev. D. S. Brown are so appreciated that Interior church tripled his salary this year.

Rev. Glenn Shaw is making his work count in Kadoka church, especially with the boys and girls.

The churches of Lake and Ordway are equipping themselves each with a house of worship and the congregation of Morristown is using its new one.

One of the most successful works in South Dakota at the present time is at Salem under the leadership of Rev. Edward Loew. Since Mr. Loew became pastor four months ago the church has trebled its membership, the Sabbath school attendance has more than doubled, a new basement is being constructed as a social room for the young men of the congregation and the auditorium is being extended to accommodate the growing audiences.

New York

A conference of rural workers will be held at Syracuse University July 8-16. Addresses will be made on the methods of conducting work in the country by churches and Y. M. C. A.'s.

After being in rented quarters for over a year, while the new church was being erected, the congregation at Olean used for the first time the new Sabbath school room for services June 22. Over 400 persons can be placed so as to see and hear easily. At night the Study Plus Good Health for Your Daughter

When your daughter goes away from home to school you will wish to make sure that she is to be trained to give the attention to maintaining the physical well being which conditions of student life demand. A sacrifice of needed school training is not essential to the protection of her vigor and strength.

The health of the student is most carefully considered and watched at Ward-Belmont. This institution, now entering a new era as the combination of two distinguished schools—Belmont College and Ward Seminary—is admirably situated for wholesome living. The water in all buildings on the campus is sterilized and aerated. Rowing, swimming the year round, horseback riding, walking, tennis, basket ball and drill in the new gymnasium are all under competent supervision. The officials of the school believe that they are responsible for the physical well being of girls committed to their care; and insistence on this point, though kindly and always agreeably accepted, is as firm as that placed upon intellectual and cultural training.

Best colleges and universities admit graduates of Ward-Belmont without examination. Students come from thirty states. Emphasis is put on thorough teaching—possible by the large number of resident teachers—one to each ten resident pupils. Regular Bible instruction, Y. W. C. A., frequent visits of pastors and compulsory church attendance somewhere, foster the religious life of students. Large, airy recitation halls, comfortable dormitory rooms, extensive musical equipment, excellent instruction in art, drawing and modeling are other features of Ward-Belmont. Send to the registrar for catalogue of collegiate, music, art or domestic science courses. IRA LANDRITH, D. D., LL. D., President. J. D. BLANTON, LL. D., Vice-President.

pastor, Rev. Harry Burton Boyd, delivered the baccalaureate sermon to the high school.

At a recent meeting of the men of Union church, Schenectady, $6,000 was pledged toward the floating debt of the church.

Dr. Calvin McClelland, in spite of the great handicap by reason of the loss of eyesight, has been doing a fine work at Union church, Newburg, whose pulpit he kindly consented to fill for twenty months. His preaching has attracted large congregations.

The ninety-seventh anniversary of the Bible school of First church, Albany, was celebrated in connection with Children's Day with a sermon by the pastor, Dr. William Herman Hopkins. This church is making preparation to observe the 150th anniversary Oct. 19-26.

Pennsylvania

Charles L. Huston and brother of Coatesville surprised the directors of the Y. M. C. A. recently by announcing that they would pay off the debt of $4,500 on the building.

Dr. James A. Patterson was installed pastor of the historic church of Franklin recently. Among those who participated in the services were Rev. S. H. Forrer of Erie, Dr. William B. Irwin of Meadville and Rev. E. B. Welch of Oil City.

At the recent annual reunion of Donegal church, one of the oldest in the state, organized in 1722, the speakers were Dr. George Norcross, Carlisle; Dr. Hugh Hamilton, Harrisburg; Mrs. Mary Patterson Beaver, Conshohocken, and Rev. William Bullock, Pequea.

Charles J. Wood of the graduating class of Auburn Seminary was ordained and installed pastor of Osceola church June 9. The following ministers of Wellsborough Presbytery officiated: Dr. A. C. Shaw, Rev. P. H. Hershey, Rev. A. B. Judson and Rev. E. T. Barr.

Ice cream soda was served to everyone who attended a recent Wednesday evening prayer meeting at Central church, Chambersburg. According to newspaper accounts the promise was made that the same program would be carried out on following hot nights. Rev. A. F. Waldo is pastor.

F. D. Crane, elder in the Presbyterian church of Sterling, Ill., now 70 years of age, is leader of a men's class which, all conditions considered, is one of the biggest Sunday school successes in the United States. In a town of 2,000 population, and in a church of 150 members, Mr. Crane's class has a membership of ninety-six, and its attendance averages between sixty and seventy. The teacher has made the name significant of welcome by calling it the "Come Back" class. Besides teaching this class Mr. Crane continues, as he has been for forty years, the superintendent of the Sunday school with which the class is connected.

Congregation Outgrows Room

Los Angeles Church Begins Work on Auditorium—Dr. Shaw to Preach During C. E. Convention New Building at San Diego.

LOS ANGELES—Knox church, Rev. H. C. Shoemaker pastor, began work on the main auditorium of a new church building July 1. This church, which ministers to a rapidly growing residential section of the city, has worshiped for a little over one year in the Sunday school rooms of the new building, and now finds these quarters too small. The new auditorium will have a seating capacity of about 400 and will cost, with the rest of the building, about $11,000.

The congregation of Immanuel church will hear their pastor-elect, John Balcom Shaw, D. D., of Chicago, Sunday, July 13. Dr. Shaw is on the program of the Christian Endeavor convention which is to be held here July 9-14. Robert Johnson, D. D., of Toronto, Canada, will occupy the pulpit of Immanuel church July 27 and Aug. 3.

San Pedro church has joined the other Protestant denominations of that city in union evangelistic services under the leadership of Evangelist George W. Taylor.

First church, San Diego, held a notable service recently in the present building, which is soon to be vacated. One hundred and six persons were received into the church. The new Sunday school rooms and assembly hall are nearly completed and will be the place of meeting until the new auditorium is ready for use.

First church, Long Beach, celebrated its silver anniversary June 22. At the time of its organization the membership was nineteen; the present membership is over 1,100. The pastor, O. H. L. Mason, D. D., was assisted in the service by Rev. H. B. Gage, who gave an historical review of the growth of the church. In the afternoon this church demonstrated its missionary spirit in the organization of a church for the eastern part of the city. This organization, whose membership of 125 was drawn largely from First church, has assumed self-support from the beginning and has plans projected for a building.

Many Attend Mission School

Prominent Workers at Conference—Two New Buildings Needed in Omaha and a Plan of Union May Result.

OMAHA—The Summer School of Missions completed its third year June 30. The enrollment was larger than formerly, while the evening attendances exceeded previous years. Charles W. Fairbanks spoke before the conference, and Robert J. Patterson, D. D., of Belfast, Ireland, gave his unique lecture on "Catch-My-Pal." The impression he made was deep and sympathetic. The last evening Charles E. Bradt, D. D., delighted his audience by his new lecture, "Japan, the Empire of Energy and Elegance."

"Plan of Synodical Supervision of Mission Work in Nebraska" is the title of a six-page folder prepared by Nathaniel McGiffin, D. D., chairman of synod's committee on home mission and Sunday school work. Nebraska's plan of mission operation has attracted such attention that this leaflet became necessary to answer the many inquiries coming from all parts of the church.

Westminster and First churches are both requiring new structures in which to prosecute their work, with new locations probable for each. While both congregations have this matter under advisement an element of each church has been working on the proposition of union. No definite plan has been proposed, and may not be for the present. Westminster has a strong committee scouting for a new pastor and expects to have someone to propose before many weeks.

Two Omaha churches—Parkvale and Florence—have each expanded their Sunday schools beyond the capacity of their respective buildings. In each instance classes are housed in structures beyond the church premises. Both appear under the necessity of reconstructing or rebuilding.

Omaha Presbytery rejoices at the action of the Assembly respecting the use to which a portion of the Kennedy fund shall be put for the purchase of church sites. One Omaha church, with exceptionally fine possibilities, is obliged to wait enlargement until this fund can assist it in a purchase of a site.

An increase of 100 per cent in ten weeks in the enrollment of the elementary division of Covenant church Sunday school was made possible by a thorough regrading of this division and its separation into departments.

James B. Wootan of The Omaha Bee editorial staff recently occupied his home pulpit, Lowe Avenue, giving an account of his attendance at the General Assembly.

M. V. Higbee, D. D., and Rev. Julius F. Schwarz, whose homes suffered greatly in the Easter tornado, have recently occupied their reconstructed residences.

Five New Churches in Spokane

Big Advances in Recent Months-Neighborhood Church Movement Is a Success with New Building Assured.

SPOKANE—This presbytery has been making decided gains along all lines this year. Five churches have been organized and seventeen Sabbath schools have been organized or reorganized. There have been 966 members added to the churches and nearly 1,500 pupils to the Sabbath schools.

First church under the splendid leadership of S. Willis McFadden, D. D., is progressing. The Sabbath school has made steady gains, especially in the attendance, which reached 408 for May. Offerings to benevolences have nearly doubled and mission study classes have been organized in all departments. Two Westminster guilds have been organized and the young women are very enthusiastic.

Centenary church, Rev. Conrad Bluhm pastor, is becoming more and more a power in the religious and civic life of the city.

Through the leadership of Rev. C. R. Scafe, pastor, Rev. A. C. Gaebeline, a lecturer and writer on Bible themes, gave a series of lectures at Fourth church during May. This venture was so successful that a committee was appointed to make such a course an annual affair.

Plans have been drawn for a new building for Emmanuel church, Rev. D. W. Ferry pastor. Both Sunday school and church have grown rapidly.

Manito Park church, Rev. Leo L. Totten pastor, has changed its name to Manito Neighborhood church, Presbyterian, that it might unite the people of the community into one strong church. This has succeeded to the extent that $4,700 has been raised for a new building and for maintenance, where $1,200 was the limit before. A part of the new building is ready for use.

Rev. George Hageman, who has been pastor at large and Sabbath school missionary for Spokane Presbytery, has resigned to take up work at Yeardly, a new and rapidly growing section of Spokane.

New work has been started at Audubon Park and Burns addition, with C. H. Bell, D. D., in charge.

Keep Up Fight on Sunday Races

Tacoma Preachers Denounce Desecration of Day—Committee Considers Offer to Move Whitworth College to Spokane.

TACOMA—Christian people are very much aroused over the automobile races to be held July 6—Sunday. The ministerial alliance addressed letters to all of the pastors in this region asking them to preach on Sabbath observance June 29. This is with the hope that people will bethink themselves in time to avoid the temptation to attend. A branch of the Lord's Day Alliance has been organized to begin a systematic campaign against Sabbath desecration and to build up and strengthen a sentiment more favorable to the day.

The committee of five appointed by the trustees of Whitworth College have investigated the offer from Spokane and the suggestion for removal to that city is under consideration.

The little church at Manitou Park has been at a standstill since its organization. But now there are many signs of new life and growth.

Whitworth College suffers a great loss in the resignation of Professor Roe. He expects to take up his new work in Jamestown, N. D., in

Interest Children in Foreigners

Pittsburg Presbytery Prepares a Special Rally Day Program—Plan for Sunday Meetings Which Open in December.

PITTSBURG—Presbytery is taking steps to interest the children of its Sunday schools in its work among the foreign-speaking people of Allegheny county. A special program is being prepared to be used on Rally Day early in the fall. The program, aside from Scripture and songs bearing on the work, will contain facts and statistics, and a number of incidents, setting forth remarkable conversions, and results of the work. Twenty-five thousand copies will be printed. The stories of remarkable conversions will also be put up in pamphlet form and can be used for distribution at any time. These programs are being prepared by a special committee of the missions committee, headed by Dr. George Montgomery, superintendent of missions in the presbytery.

A special meeting of the Pittsburg evangelistic committee was held in the Y. M. C. A. June 27 to confer with Mr. Peacock, Billy Sunday's assistant, with reference to the Sunday meetings to be held here beginning the last week in December.

Lebanon church observed Lebanon Day Tuesday, June 24, and dedicated a tablet to the memory of a former pastor, Dr. Rockwell. Memorial services were held in Second church, Wilkinsburg, Sunday, June 22, for the former pastor, Rev. J. Allison Platts, who died one year ago. A bronze tablet was unveiled, setting forth a brief summary of the life of Dr. Platts.

Pittsburg has a remarkable philanthropist, who has been dealing out money for several years, yet his name has never been announced. The money is called the "educational fund" and is furnished to teachers of Pittsburg schools who wish to take a special course during the summer. At a dinner last week 141 teachers were supplied with money from this fund.

Some of the largest male choruses of the country will compete in the international Eisteddfod to be held in Pittsburg July 2-5. The first prize will be $5,500.

Dr. W. A. Jones, pastor of Knoxville church, will attend the Christian Endeavor convention at Los Angeles. Dr. Jones is president of the Pennsylvania state Christian Endeavor society.

Await Court Decision on Union

Opinion in Missouri Valley College Case Important—Church Observes Anniversary of Dr. Baity—Elder for 47 Years.

KANSAS CITY—The test case for Missouri Synod, involving the property of Missouri Valley College, was recently argued before the United States federal court in Kansas City. The whole Presbyterian Church is especially interested in this case, in which it is sought not only to secure a practical reversal of the decision of the supreme court of Missouri but also to determine for all time the validity of the union with the Cumberland Church with reference to this important college.

The Hollister assembly for young people, which convenes July 29—Aug. 5, is arousing unusual interest among the young people of the state. Rev. William Ralph Hall of the young people's department of our board will have charge.

Westport church June 29 celebrated the twentieth anniversary of the pastorate of Dr. George P. Baity. Dr. Baity has probably done the conspicuous work of his life in this church. When he became its pastor it was a very weak, struggling home mission. It is now one of the strongest Presbyterian churches in the state.

First church May 25 held an anniversary service in honor of the fifty-four years of continuous membership of P. S. Brown, who has served as elder there forty-seven years. June 29 was observed as "home coming day" for all former members of this church.

First church, Independence, has assumed the full support of a pastor in the foreign field, Rev. John Wallis Creighton of Yeungkong, China. The annual convention of the third district of Christian Endeavor in this state was held in this church recently. It was one of the most largely attended and enthusiastic held for many years.

Linwood church under the aggressive leadership of Dr. Harry C. Rogers has established a home for convalescents in the city. A complete organization has been effected in the church for the carrying out of their plans.

"Old Second" church under the pastorate of Rev. Gerrit Snyder is forging ahead hopefully in its new location in the Country Club and looks forward to the erection of a new building.

Covenant church progresses steadily. Plans are now under way for the building of a commodious chapel to cost about $12,000.

Celebrate Beecher Anniversary

Service at Base of Statue—Plymouth Church Will Remember Great Preacher in Fall—Dr. A. W. Halsey Recovering from Injury.

NEW YORK—Incident to the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Henry Ward Beecher many services have been held throughout the East. One of these services was held at the base of the Beecher statue in front of the Borough hall in Brooklyn. Plymouth church is deferring its centenary celebration until the completion of the Beecher memorial building, which adjoins the church. It will be dedicated in the fall.

A conference of representatives from many of the 2,000 social relief societies of New York was held last week in the Church of the Ascension.

The city evangelistic committee, which is directed by Dr. Arthur J. Smith, announces that a church of 320 members has been organized as the outgrowth of one of its tent meetings.

Presbyterians throughout the country will be interested in the announcement that Dr. Joseph A. Blake, who has been at the head of the staff of surgeons in the Presbyterian hospital for several years, has resigned. Dr. Blake has performed operations on many leading Americans, among whom are Dr. Mayo of Rochester, Minn., and Theodore Roosevelt.

Dr. Jesse F. Forbes, secretary of the church extension committee of New York Presbytery, during the summer vacation will preach at Wainscott, L. I. This is practically the only preaching heard in the community of several hundred people during the year.

MEN BUILD CHURCH ADDITION

The little church at Harrison, a suburb of New York, found itself not long ago in need of an additional room to its building, which could be used both for the Sunday school and as a place for social gatherings. There seemed to be no money for the erection of such a room, but the men under the leadership of the pastor, Lester H. Bent, a student in Union Seminary, pledged their own work and time. Practically all of these men go into New York each day for their business, but every evening and Saturday afternoon finds them engaged upon the building. Wednesday evening a half-hour halt is called for prayer, but other nights they work on till 10 o'clock. The women assist by providing refreshments on Saturday. It is a fact worthy of note that among the volunteer workers is a Catholic. It is estimated that the improvement will cost about $2,000.

The Episcopalian committee which under chairmanship of Rector Manning of Trinity church is laboring to organize a world conference on faith and order embracing all denominations has asked Dr. J. H. Jowett and Dr. William H. Roberts to serve on an interdenominational commission to solicit the cooperation of British churches. Dr. Roberts and General Ralph E. Prime were appointed to seek an indorsement of the proposed conference from the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance at Aberdeen.

Dr. A. W. Halsey is making a very satisfactory recovery at the Presbyterian hospital from the operation necessitated by the recent accident to his left knee. It will be a month yet before he is able to walk.

St. James church, the colored Presbyterian church of the presbytery which has done very efficient work among the increasing population of that race, is in the midst of a spirited campaign to raise $3,200 with which to wipe out a mortgage which has acted as a handicap to the work of this organization. Rev. W. R. Lawton, who has been acting as stated supply, has been asked to continue his work.

Financial Situation

Business Continues Very Good in Big Grain States - Government to Start Experts After Cause of High Prices.

From the provisions of the contemplated federal act establishing reserve banks with note issuing powers, it is evident that the present system of national banks and notes will remain comparatively undisturbed. Bankers are not agreed as to the merits of the details of the plan for supervision of the central bank. Business men will be glad, however, when some method is provided whereby additional currency may be made available in times of stringency. Current trade reflects to a limited extent the readjustments which may be necessary following the passage of the tariff and currency measures. According to Bradstreet's, however, in the surplus grain states current and future orders are up to expectations.

What One Man Saved

An interesting example of the hoarding of money is revealed in the recent sale by The Baltimore Sun of securities of Baltimore after the manner of other recent offerings of municipal bonds. A man brought a candy box full of money, amounting to $5,000, his savings of thirty-three years, with which to buy bonds. He had at no time earned more than $3.60 a day, and for most of the time supported his parents and a sister. A text could be found in this for a sermon on the danger of keeping money in large amounts about the house, or on the advantages and possibilities of thrift, and still another on the loss the man has sustained by not investing his money sooner. Assuming that he had but half of the amount, $2,500, invested at only 4 per cent, he would each year have received enough to give him a month's vacation, and if the interest had been invested and not spent he would have had $10,000 now in place of $5,000, and with $10,000 invested in 6 per cent farm mortgages a man may reasonably be sure of enough to eat and wear for the rest of his life.

The price of cattle has recently advanced considerably, due, is is said, in part to the clause putting beef on the free list in the Underwood bill. On the Chicago market beef two weeks ago reached the high point of the year, $9.20 a hundred pounds at the stockyards, but later declined slightly. This means that retail meat may also advance. There are increasing evidences that the beef famine in this country is real. The exports have fallen off to a great degree. Wholesale prices of cattle increased 29.4 per cent last year according to recently published figures by the bureau of labor statistics.

Another Hunt for Cause of Prices

A further effort is soon to be made to solve the mystery of the increased cost of living. Secretary of Agriculture Houston has issued orders for an investigation of the marketing of perishable products, including the prices received by producers, cost of transportation and storage, and the profits by each party handling the products. Specialists will also study coöperative marketing associations. Agricultural experts have been contending for some time that the falling off in production per acre, especially in the wheat fields of the country, has had much to do with the increased cost of living. Some writers have portrayed the action of farmers in sending abroad their wheat as analogous to wrapping up a bundle of greenbacks and inclosing it in every carload of grain that leaves the farm. The production of alfalfa and similar nitrogen giving plants is being urged and farmers are being educated to the fact that it is best for them and for their farms that a considerable portion of the product of the soil be fed to live stock kept on the farm. Bankers of South Dakota are selling heifers at cost to the settlers on the recently opened reservation in that state in an endeavor to increase the productivity of the soil and enlarge the bank accounts of the farmers.

Summer Services Have Grown

Evangelistic Meetings Popular in Philadelphia —Attempt Made to Arouse Public Sentiment Against Immorality.

PHILADELPHIA — Summer evangelistic services have greatly developed and expanded in Philadelphia since the Presbyterian summer tent evangelistic movement was inaugurated under the leadership of John H. Converse fifteen years ago. Other denominations have followed suit along the same lines. The Lemon Hill nonsectarian Sunday services have become a permanent center under the leadership of Dr. J. B. Ely, and on a recent Sunday the churches of all denominations in the northern section of the city have established union services in Hunting park. They will be held every Sunday afternoon at 4 p. m. and will be in charge of the different pastors and their churches. The opening service June 29 was conducted by Rev. Charles E. Dunn of Tioga church. On July 20 Colonel Holz of the Salvation Army, with his staff band, will be in charge. Suburban towns are also inaugurating similar services. The churches of Bryn Mawr and of Wayne will hold union summer night meetings. At the first service at Bryn Mawr a choir of fifty voices and a village band participated.

The pastor of Gaston church, Rev. W. B. Greenway, has united with ministers of Reformed, Episcopal, Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, Evangelical, Covenant, Mennonite and Friends bodies in a printed "appeal to the religious people of North Philadelphia" to take cognizance of threatening evils to the young associated with the theater, dance halls, popular songs, styles of dress, the parks and street scenes, resorts and Sunday excursions, and urges the creation of such a public opinion as will compel the enforcement of the law against immorality.

PLEADS FOR THE BOYS

At the seventh annual conference of Federated Boys' Clubs Director of Public Safety Porter, who is a Presbyterian elder, pleaded that the boy organizations of the churches get the boy regardless of doctrinal differences. He declared that "the tendency toward a liberal Sunday was something that the police department had to contend with in its juvenile work, and that the churches should cooperate in providing Sunday afternoon affairs of interest to the young." He deplored the parental laxity that allowed boys and girls to remain away from home until late at night. One of the speakers at the conference was Vice-President Marshall.

Stanley E. Kerr, son of Rev. James R. Kerr of Darby Borough church, was first honor man in a class of 137 graduating from Philadelphia high school. A son of Rev. Edwin J. Reinke, pastor of Evans Memorial church, at the commencement of Lafayette College was awarded a scholarship in the Philadelphia Medico-Chirurgical College.

First church of Germantown, having 1,384 communicants, has closed one of the most successful years in the seven years' pastorate of W. B. Jennings, D. D. It is a free pew church and is supported by voluntary subscriptions. Its budget for the year calls for $24,000.

Hollond Memorial church gave a complimentary dinner to its pastor, C. A. R. Janvier, D. D., the evening of June 26. There were addresses by Doctors J. R. Davies, W. P. Fulton, J. G. Newman, R. E. L. Jarvis and Rev. Park Hays Miller. At a congregational meeting June 27 it was agreed to unite with Dr. Janvier in asking for the dissolution of his pastoral relation owing to his conviction that the call to India was of God. He will preach his farewell sermon the first Sunday of August and after a brief vacation will sail early in September for the Orient to become president of Ewing College, Allahabad.

Dramatics for Sunday Schools?

Suggestion Made at Institute of Workers—Dr. H. T. Kerr to Leave Chicago—Ministers Learn About Making of Laws.

CHICAGO—"Good dramatics are better than poor sermons for Sunday school children," according to the opinion of Rev. Herbert W. Gates of Rochester, N. Y., speaking at the recent Sunday school institute at the University of Chicago. He declared that the child who acted the part of Ruth, for example, would get unforgettable lessons in loyalty. He also suggested that moving pictures will soon be a part of the program of up-to-date Sunday schools. The making of topographical maps and drawings by the pupils was suggested as one of the ways in which to keep young folks interested in the vital things of the Bible. The singing of hymns in a dignified way was urged by Professor H. A. Smith of Chicago Theological Seminary. He said that hymns should not be dropped from the mouth like something too hot too hold.

William A. Peterson was the lay preacher at the first open air service of Edgewater church last Sunday. The large porch of the church, the walks and the street were filled by pedestrians and parties of automobilists, who listened to the service. Granville Avenue church was the outgrowth of similar street preaching by the pastor of Edgewater church, Dr. L. P. Cain.

Open air services are being held each evening by workers from Olivet Institute at different locations near the church.

The ministers last Monday learned something of the intricacies of passing temperance legislation through the Illinois legislature from E. J. Davis of the Anti-Saloon League.

DR. KERR ACCEPTS CALL

Dr. Hugh T. Kerr, pastor of Fullerton Avenue church for the past six years, has sent word to the officers of Shady Side church, Pittsburg, that he intends to accept the call to that pulpit, as announced two weeks ago. He will not take up his work there until October.

Dr. George B. Safford, assistant superintendent of the Church Extension Board, has been asked to become superintendent for the Minnesota branch of the Anti-Saloon League and has the matter under consideration. He is chairman of the headquarters committee of the Illinois branch of the Anti-Saloon League and has been a member of this important committee for ten years.

Dedication of the new Chicago Heights church will take place this fall. When the people started to build it was not thought that a complete church could be erected, but $30,000 has been spent, including payment for an organ and new pews. Dr. J. B. Fleming, pastor, recently completed seven years with this church, during which time it has raised over $40,000 in addition to its benevolences. The first work among Italians by Presbyterians here was started by this church.

DIRECTORS FOR TRAINING SCHOOL

At a meeting of the Presbyterian Training School Corporation last Thursday directors were elected for the ensuing year as follows: Frank H. Armstrong, Henry M. Bacon, Mrs. Albert L. Berry, Leon M. Betts, Louis Boisot, L. A. Bowman, Mrs. W. S. Plumer Bryan, Frank G. Coe, John A. Cole, William C. Covert, D. D.; Mrs. Bryan Y. Craig, James Crighton, Lawrence H. Dudley, Jeremiah Haines, Samuel P. Hedges, Edgar P. Hill, D. D.; W. F. Hypes, George N. Luccock, D. D.; Charles M. Moderwell, Mrs. N. G. Moore, Mrs. Jacob Mortensen, William E. Rice, H. A. Rumsey, E. W. S. Shipman, Mrs. John Timothy Stone, Edward H. Smith, Mrs. Thomas E. Wells, Dixon C. Williams and Lindsay T. Woodcock. The corporation consists of a representative group of Presbyterians elected subject to the approval of the Church Extension Board. The title of the head of the school was changed from "director" to "president." President McAfee reported an encouraging outlook for the coming year.

The boxing bill against which the Christian Endeavorers and other Christian forces had been working was "killed" recently at Springfield. The recent death of a prize fighter in the ring is said to have influenced the legislators. Dr. W. B. Millard, representing the Chicago Church Federation Council, and Dr. M. P. Boynton, representing "United Protestantism," worked against the passage of the bill.

Laws Will Aid Moral Advance

Missouri Legislature Abolishes Free Lunch in Saloons - Special Musical Service at First Church Interesting.

ST. LOUIS—More than 200 laws enacted by the legislature of Missouri went into effect Monday, June 23. Three that are of moral interest are those prohibiting the storing of liquor in dry territories, and saloon free lunches, and the white slave act, which provides for a drastic penalty, and which, in conjunction with the federal statute, will, it is hoped, practically wipe out traffic in women.

At the morning service in First church, Sunday, June 15, reminiscences of St. Louis church music in the '50s were told by H. M. Blossom, for many years musical director of the church. Under Mr. Blossom's direction the choir presented a part of the fifty-first psalm, the musical setting of which was composed by P. G. Anton sixty years ago. The composer was an organist in the city at that time. B. P. Fullerton, D. D., field secretary of the Home Board, preached. Mr. Blosson has made church music his hobby.

George Sherwood Eddy, who has just completed an eight months' tour among the students of China and India, addressed three well attended meetings Sunday, June 15. In the morning he spoke in Pilgrim Congregational church, which supported him when he was stationed in India. In the afternoon he addressed the Y. W. C. A. and at night was heard at a brotherhood meeting in West Presbyterian church.

The convention of the sixth district of Missouri Christian Endeavorers met in Jefferson Street church, St. Charles, June 20 and continued through Sunday. About 500 delegates attended, of whom 125 were from this city. The convention closed with a consecration meeting Sunday night.

Hold Church in a High School

Columbus Congregations Gradually Resuming Work - Northminster Edifice Is to Be Completed This Summer.

COLUMBUS—The congregation of West Broad Steet church is now holding services in the West side high school building. The church building was seriously damaged by the recent flood and will probably be reconstructed. The West side churches have all resumed regular services. By diligent and painstaking work much of the debris has been cleared away and that section of the city is gradually returning to the pursuit of ordinary lines of enterprise.

Rev. John G. Currey, formerly of Kilbourne, has accepted calls to the churches of Gahanna, Reynoldsburg and Black Lick. The installation service at Gahanna took place Thursday evening, June 26. Reverends Walter H. Houston, S. C. Bates of West Liberty and B. F. Jacobs, a former pastor, took part. The installation at Reynoldsburg was held the following evening.

Rev. I. L. Dungan of Middleport was installed over the church at Lancaster June 9. Rev. J. T. Britan, moderator of presbytery, presided. Reverends W. M. Hindman, D. S. Tappan and A. Y. Wilcox of Marietta took part.

Rev. E. L. Guth of the M. E. Church, who recently completed the theological course at Lane Seminary, will be installed as pastor of the churches at Whisler, Laurelville and Tarlton July 10.

The congregation of Northminster church is preparing to push to completion the new church building this summer. W. H.

Vice-Moderator Booth Dead

Frederick A. Booth, vice-moderator of General Assembly, died suddenly Sunday, June 29, at his home in New York City. He was 64 years old and was engaged in various philanthropic and religious affairs. He was treasurer of New York Presbytery, a member of the board of directors of Robert College, Constantinople, a member of the church extension committee, chairman of committee on Chinese work in New York Presbytery and treasurer and senior elder of University Place church. He was chosen vice-moderator by Dr. Stone, moderator of Assembly, on account of Dr. Stone's affection for the late Dr. Henry M. Booth, a brother, who was president of Auburn Seminary when Dr. Stone graduated there. Another brother was the late Dr. Robert Russell Booth.

Stelzle Leaves Home Board to Be Consulting Sociologist

Charles Stelzle

Rev. Charles Stelzle, for ten years director of social service work for the Presbyterian Church, resigned as superintendent of the Home Board's bureau of social service last Saturday to become consulting sociologist for undenominational church organizations, industrial enterprises and social service agencies. In spite of the entreaties of members of the board and associate secretaries he refused to reconsider his action. Mr. Stelzle organized the department of church and labor for the Presbyterian Church, the first bureau of the kind of any denomination. He established Labor temple and was executive secretary of the Federal Council's social service commission one year, was director of the social service features of the Men and Religion campaign and director of the publicity campaign for the home missions council during last year.

Funeral of Louis H. Severance

Funeral services for Louis H. Severance were held last Saturday at Cleveland, Ohio, at the home of Dr. Dudley P. Allen, a son-in-law. Dr. Paul F. Sutphen of Second church, formerly pastor of Woodland Avenue church, conducted the service, assisted by Dr. Edward A. Krapp of Woodland Avenue church and Dr. Thomas S McWilliams of Calvary church. Dr. Sutphen spoke briefly of the princeliness of the character of Mr. Severance, showing his allegiance to inherited principles and interest in even the most humble members of the church with which he was connected.

Charles T. Thompson, clerk of session in Westminster church, Minneapolis, and a member of Assembly's Executive Commission, received at commencement time the degree of LL. D. from his alma mater, Denison College, Ohio.

You will want to read these

READING for the warm summer days and evenings ought to be sprightly and interesting, but it need not be merely so. You will be interested in these special features, but you won't be wasting your time in reading them. You haven't thought about your vacation a bit harder than we have about what we shall print between now and the time snow flies. We're especially mindful that the children won't be playing quite "every minute" of their long rest from school, so we have all done our best for them. Surprising how many different people help in the course of a year just to make this one department please and serve its special corps of followers. Then there will be some good wholesome stories that won't leave a bad taste behind, but will tend to pleasant thoughts. And of course articles and pictures will be kept up to the standard straight through. Continent readers mostly take some vacation from work and study but they don't take a vacation from reading The Continent any more than they take one from eating. Good time to tell your friends about the paper and get them to reading it. If you are away from home you'll find it already in many places, but you can use your copy to advantage just the same. Be sure to have The Continent follow you. Send your changes of address early so that you may not miss a copy.

Around the Shop

The more religious papers are discussed and criticised—favorably or unfavorably—the better it is for them and for the church. The religious weekly is either worth while, or it is not. Either it has a proper place in the workings of the church, general and local, and should be heartily encouraged, or it is a useless incumbrance and should be abolished. Of course it must by its quality prove itself worthy of support; but that is a detail.

Our Methodist friends, who own their paper officially and have to foot the bills, can't escape this question; and there are signs of an awakening to the real issue. Bishop Smith, says The New York Christian Advocate, recently declared that "the Methodist Episcopal Church has two great educational departments, the first of which is composed of her scholastic institutions in their several grades, upon which millions of dollars for buildings, equipment and endowment are most worthily bestowed. The publishing business of the church constitutes the other great educational department, the primary purpose of which is not making money, but diffusing Christian literature."

The different treatment accorded these two departments of education was illustrated by Bishop Smith when he said:

"We pour out millions of dollars that we may build, equip and endow our schools in order that education may be brought within the reach of all the youth, even the poorest. So should it be. But how do we treat the religious press? Do we erect buildings, or create endowments, for this educational work? Far from it. On the contrary, we tax it."

There is, to be sure, not an exact parallel, for Presbyterian papers are not under official control. But the same question applies to both:

If they are worth while, are we making the fullest possible use of them?

CHICAGO VARNISH CO.

CHICAGO Established 1865 NEW YORK

The POSTAL LIFE helps its Policyholders

THE POSTAL is the most helpful (and useful) life insurance institution because it not only gives to its policyholders all that other companies give but much that they do not and some things that they can not give, as may be seen from the following:

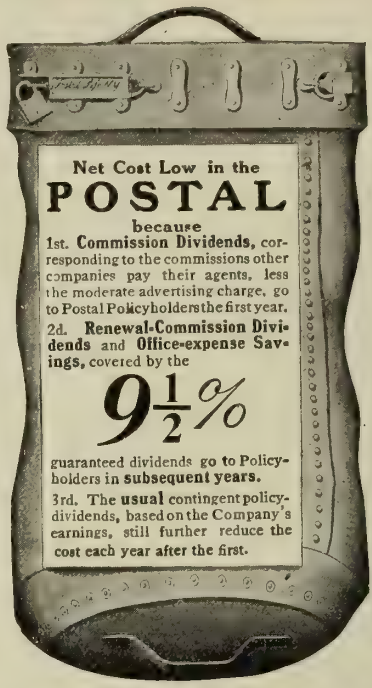
Exclusive Benefits and Privileges

1. No agency company allows to its policyholders any portion of the agent's commissions. The Postal, because of its non-agency method, does this not only the first year but every other year during the premium-paying period.

2. No other American Company can give its policyholders the benefit of interstate savings and home-office economies based on non-agency methods.

3. The savings or economies, shown in the mail-bag as dividends, are distinct with the Postal Life Insurance Company.

4. The Postal's optional premium privilege enables policyholders to deposit their premiums monthly, if they so prefer.



Net Cost Low in the
because

1st. Commission Dividends, corresponding to the commissions other companies pay their agents, less the moderate advertising charge, go to Postal Policyholders the first year.

2d. Renewal-Commission Dividends and Office-expense Savings, covered by the guaranteed dividends go to Policyholders in subsequent years.

3rd. The usual contingent policy-dividends, based on the Company's earnings, still further reduce the cost each year after the first.

Exclusive Benefits and Privileges

5. If through sickness or accident policyholders become totally and permanently disabled, the Company pays their premiums for them.

6. The Company's Medical Department prepares and distributes to policyholders timely bulletins on health preservation and disease prevention.

7. Its Health Bureau also gives to each policyholder, if desired, the privilege of one free medical examination each year so as to detect disease in time to check or cure it, thus considerably reducing mortality and making material additional savings.

Be your own agent and save the agent's commission for yourself

POSTAL LIFE BUILDING

In writing simply say: Mail me insurance particulars for my age as per THE CONTINENT for July 10

In your letter be sure to give:

1. Your Full Name.

STRONG POSTAL POINTS

First: Old-line legal reserve insurance---not fraternal or assessment.

Second: Standard policy reserves, now $10,000,000. Insurance in force $50,000,000.

Third: Standard policy provisions, approved by the State Insurance Department.

Fourth: Operates under strict State requirements and subject to the United States postal authorities.

Fifth: High medical standards in the selection of risks.

Sixth: Policyholders' Health Bureau provides one free medical examination each year, if desired.

Everybody Can Be an Artist

WOULDN'T YOU LIKE TO BE ABLE TO PAINT PICTURES?

To be sure, you would. Everybody would. Lots of "hard-headed" folks pretend to despise art, but they would change their tone quickly if they had the least notion that they themselves could produce anything in that line.

Among young folks especially there always lurks a half-shamed, silent hope that somehow talent will develop in them to do something beautiful in painting or sculpture. If a boy or girl is alive enough to have any sort of aspirations at all in the world, some dreams or other are almost sure to run in the direction of art.

Some lure and claim of the beautiful creeps into all hearts that have not been sodden utterly in sin or despair.

But where an occasional one here and there can find the way to painting or carving or equivalent artistry in music, multiplied tens of thousands have to put their longing away unsatisfied, too shamefaced over the absurdity of it to tell even their intimate friends. A host of people who speak of art with contempt are really people who have buried away in their hearts some impossible aspiration after it.

But need the art longing be put away and lost because there is no talent in the hands for the brush or chisel or the organ and piano keys or the violin bow?

Think a little about your own feeling for beauty. What in all your experience has most stirred your soul with a sense of loveliness and grace? What in all you have ever seen or heard has seemed most to carry you above yourself into a finer air of life?

Unless you have utterly starved your spirit, you have a good many things to remember which such questions call up. Perhaps there has been some picture—not necessarily a great painting, often the commonest sort of a newspaper print will do it—that has given you a great swell of soul, a stir of emotion that almost choked you.

And there must be some quiet landscape somewhere which you love to recall because your whole being grew larger and stronger as you looked at it. Nearly everyone cherishes the recollection of some superb sunset he once watched—a spectacle in the sky that seemed to pull the very spirit out of him into cloudland.

Likewise, in spite of the fact that so many people are deaf to the technical beauties of music, there are few who do not cherish in their hearts some favorite melody of song which awakes a nobler sense of life whenever they hear it.

Such are the appeals of art—the art that men make and the finer art of nature. But if art is to be judged by the inspiration of its appeal, there is a greater art in the world than painting, sculpture, music or even the works of nature.

Say, now, if this is not an absolute truth from your own experience:

Is it not a fact that far more than you ever thrilled to any picture or song or landscape, you have been set aquiver to the core of your being by the sight or story of some unpretentious soul living a self-forgetful life in the service of others?

That is the greatest art which casts the greatest spell over the heart of the observer.

By this test the greatest of all arts is the art of unselfish living.

Consider—did you ever look on any exquisitely painted picture that moved you so deeply as the tale, for example, of the multitude of heroic souls on the Titanic who stood aside and accepted death in order that lives weaker than theirs might be saved?

Or have you ever heard music to which you responded with the same instinctive surge of reverence that flooded over your life at some simple account of how the poor sacrifice for the poor in the slums of great cities—how the sick help the sick and the crippled aid the crippled?

Or was there ever a glimpse of nature, in even her highest sublimity, that put you in such awe as silences you when you hear of missionaries like Livingstone and Judson and Paton and Damien, and a host as worthy as they, who counted their lives not dear to themselves if only they could carry some hope to the benighted and comfort to the afflicted?

The list of such questions that one could ask is long, but the answer out of your own memory of the noblest emotions that ever possessed you will confirm the general fact insisted on.

It is life which is capable of higher beauty than anything else this world knows.

A life devoted to others is the most beautiful thing in the world.

You would like to paint pictures—and you can't. But why should your aspirations for the artistic stop defeated on that low level?

We agree that there is a higher art than that—an art more thrilling—an art more profoundly and movingly beautiful. Why not practice this better beauty?

Perhaps we have come on the secret of the reason why the Creator has put this mysterious longing after artistic expression so universally into the hearts of all qualities and grades of people.

The religious philosophers often say that the Father never ingrains into humanity any common desire penetrating the race at large without providing some way for general realizing of the desire. Yet this would seem at first a great exception—so many people wanting to be artists and yet unable to be.

But here suddenly we have turned a corner where there falls a new light on the contradiction. It is not after all the mockery it seemed. Here is the wonder which we begin to apprehend.

All persons long for art, and the very highest art is open to all persons. If to live unselfishly is the ultimate beauty, then there is a chance for everybody to be a great artist.

What would you not give and do, by way of expense, by way of sacrifice and by way of labor, in order to learn the skill of putting on canvas in one exquisite painting the soul of all your longing for beauty?

Are you not then willing to spend as much in labor, sacrifice and outlay—especially in the patience of endless practice—to achieve the secret of living an exquisite life?

Just to put yourself heart and soul into some service done wholly for others and not at all for yourself—in your own home, in your town, in some foreign land, wherever God calls you—is the way whereby any day you may "start to art school."

The course is long, the tuition not small, but the achievement is sure—and it is worth its cost.

Don't you want to be an artist in the beautiful life?

Balkan States Fighting Among Themselves

Old-time jealousies, based on new-found grievances, have brought on another Balkan war. The four states are no longer united against the common enemy, Turkey, but Greece, Servia and Montenegro have turned against Bulgaria. Roumania, which managed to keep out of the last war, threatens to be drawn in because of her hostility to Bulgaria. Fighting broke out between the former allies without any formal declaration of war, and in spite of diplomatic negotiations between representatives of the little nations and their big international colleagues. Russia had already agreed to act as arbitrator between Servia and Bulgaria, and had tried to bring about a meeting of the premiers of all the Balkan states in St. Petersburg, and Austria also wanted to mediate, but these amicable even if not wholly disinterested plans were brought temporarily to naught by the fierce clash of the armies still in the field.

The former allies were not to blame for the origin of the trouble. Before the Balkan league began war with Turkey a treaty was made providing for a future partition of the territory it was hoped to wrest from the Turk. Servia, Greece and Montenegro were to have Albania, Bulgaria was to have the major part of Macedonia. These tentative arrangements were violently upset by the later plans of erecting Albania as an independent state—an unlooked for project forced by the insistence of Austria with the assent of the other great powers. This took a large and desirable area from the victors, and left Servia and Montenegro with little or nothing to requite them for their loss of money and blood, so they demanded a redivision of the remaining conquered territory. But the Bulgarians, with reason, claimed that they had borne the brunt of the Turkish assaults and, as they had done most of the fighting, were entitled to the lion's share of the spoil—furthermore, they wanted what the original treaty gave them.

Greek and Servian forces on the one side fought a severe engagement with the Bulgarians, who are said to have begun the attack near Istip. At Kilkish, twenty-five miles from Salonica, the Greeks reported that they had routed the Bulgar army after a furious bombardment. The battle was called more important than any fought in the Turkish campaign.

Having meddled to the extent of taking Albania away from the conquerors, the great powers should go further and compel arbitration of the Balkan war No. 2. Russia and Austria may not be unwilling to see these small states weaken one another, and thereby prevent the establishment of a strong confederacy which might interfere with access to or control of the Mediterranean.

Reign of Terror in Rand Gold Mines Strike

A strike of miners employed in the famous gold mines on the Rand, South Africa, led to the proclamation of martial law by Governor General Gladstone last week and battles in the streets of Johannesburg between rioters and government troops. In several sharp conflicts Saturday afternoon twenty persons were reported killed and 150 wounded, and a hundred were reported killed or wounded the day previous. Rioters burned many small shops and cottages at the town of Benoni; all places of business in Johannesburg were closed and guarded by soldiery and bands of armed citizens patrolled the residential quarter. The Rand Club, whose membership includes mine owners, was invaded by rioters who were three times dispersed by troops, who finally had to fire two volleys directly at the attacking mob. All train and street car service was suspended and the leaders of the strike, which is apparently exceptionally well organized, demanded that the newspapers cease publication. Government officials made an earnest effort to settle the strike, but the basis of negotiations, which required the strikers to return to work pending a final adjustment of all grievances, was at first refused by the strikers in spite of efforts of the mine engineers.

At Pretoria the recall of Viscount Gladstone, the governor general, was asked for in a petition to the imperial government by the federated trades unions because of the calling out of troops. A similar suggestion was made at a huge meeting of strikers in Johannesburg.

Charges of Extended Lobbying Being Investigated

Colonel Mulhall's letters and stories on the modern history of lobbying in Congress continued to be printed last week and this by The New York World and The Chicago Tribune, with additional echoes, comments and details by other newspapers of the country. Both the senate and the house were stirred as seldom before, and each chamber set its investigating machinery at work. The senate committee, headed by Senator Overman, had already done considerable work before the Mulhall disclosures were printed, but the house received a resolution for a comprehensive inquiry designed to let daylight into all the dark corners. Opposition to the resolution centered on a proposition to employ counsel and investigators to aid the committee, it being contended that this was unnecessary, as members of the committee were lawyers. Vote on the resolution was delayed, but in the meantime the senate committee was at work.

Between forty and fifty persons were involved or named by Mulhall, and they are to be asked whether a lobby exists for improperly defeating or expediting legislation on the subjects of the currency system, the "money trust," conservation, interstate commerce, ship subsidies, Indian affairs and the liquor traffic; whether lobby operations have affected the letting of government contracts for armor plate and war supplies; whether the National Association of Manufacturers has rewarded or attacked members of Congress as asserted by Mulhall, and whether the great labor organizations have sought to influence "labor" measures by questionable pressure.

The organized labor phase of the matter becomes pertinent because Mulhall is said formerly to have been actively employed by the same interests who profited by his work at Washington as a strike-breaker. He claims to have disorganized and defeated several important strikes in various parts of the country. Like all his operations, these efforts were always under cover, and the truth or falsity of his allegations remains to be determined. The innocent intent of many of the men he has named will no doubt be established, but enough of scandal remains to justify suspicion.

President Wilson probably did not know how extensive a field of investigation he was uncovering when he first made his charges against the "insidious and industrious" lobby, but looked at from any point of view it would seem as though the revelations now being made are bound to be beneficial to the public at large. The more the public can learn about its own business the better, for experience has shown that corruption breeds in ignorance and indifference, whereas publicity operates as a germicide.

Prison Proposed for Certain Kinds of Lobbying

Punishment by fine or imprisonment for improper attempts to influence the course of legislation is provided for in a bill proposed by Senator Cummins. It aims at practices such as Colonel Mulhall has been relating and also against the false use of the names of representatives and senators and public officials, such as was admitted by David Lamar, called the "wolf of Wall street." Lamar told the senate lobby investigating committee that he had impersonated leading congressmen in telephone conversations with Robert S. Lovett of the Union Pacific and other captains of industry. The bill also penalizes a person who makes false claims that he is acting in behalf of a member of Congress or other official, and generally makes it difficult for private lobbyists, working under cover, to accomplish or pretend to their employers that they have accomplished their ends. Under existing laws lawyers say Lamar cannot be punished, even though his duplicity is confessed.

Gettysburg Celebration Held; Perry Memorial Begun

The semicentennial celebration of the anniversary of the battle of Gettysburg proved to be, as anticipated, peculiarly impressive—this in spite of the intense heat which prevailed. The great camp in the Pennsylvania hills where the battle was fought was filled with soldiers of the past and present, including a representative attendance of the survivors of the hosts of General Lee. The commander in chief of the United Confederate Veterans, General Bennett H. Young, was given a most enthusiastic reception when he made his address. Just previously the governor of Pennsylvania had been greeted with the old-time "rebel yell." Large numbers of state executives and federal officials were present at part or all of the ceremonies.

President Wilson delivered the principal oration on July 4. The meaning of the past and its message to the future formed his theme. He declared the battle of today is one of peace, but the work begun by the veterans fifty years ago is far from finished, the nation "has not yet squared itself with its own great standards set up at its birth, when it made its first appeal to the judgment of mankind."

A striking incident was the tribute of the regular army to the memory of the thousands of dead who lie buried on the historic field. On July 4 the headquarters flag dropped to half mast, every officer and soldier came to attention and a salute of forty-eight guns was fired.

Another memorable celebration was opened on Independence Day at Put-in-Bay, Ohio, to mark the 100th anniversary of Commodore Perry's victory over the British on Lake Erie and other happenings of the war of 1812. The signing of the treaty of Ghent in 1814, which began a century of peace between America and England, will also be commemorated, as there is to be a series of celebrations at various points on the great lakes and at Louisville, Kentucky. The corner stone of the memorial which is to be the permanent monument of Perry's victory was laid Friday, a beginning of a million dollar undertaking of notably broad and generous conception.

Important Topics at Christian Citizenship Conference

The second world's Christian citizenship conference closed an eight days' session at Portland, Oregon, last Sunday. Two years ago the first conference was held at Philadelphia under the auspices of the long established National Reform Association, and ambitious plans were made for this gathering, to which a representative attendance of religious leaders was attracted. The object of the convention was stated to be "the revival and diffusion of national religion or a deeper and more general sense of the accountability of nations and governments to God and their dependence on him"—a movement looking to "universal advancement in militant Christianity, in individual, family and civic life, in general education and in public morals." The principal meetings were held in the Multanomah stadium. Dr. Henry C. Minton of Trenton, New Jersey, was president of the conference.

Representatives of the federal and state governments participated and President Wilson sent a message of greeting, concluding with this sentence: "It is certainly one of my deepest convictions that there can be no inspiration in the performance of public duty without the quickening of Christian principle." Charles W. Fairbanks, former vice-president of the United States; Rev. John Lamond of Edinburgh and Dr. Robert F. Coyle of Denver figured on the program, the latter making a vigorous attack upon Mormonism, which the audience ratified by a liberal financial contribution. Dr. Coyle excoriated Mormonism as a menace to the political life of the nation entirely apart from its religious aspects, and he demanded the expulsion from Congress of Senator Smoot. Dr. Ng Poon Chew spoke of the influence of Christianity in the formation of the Chinese republic and urged that Christianity has still more to do in solidifying the character of the new republic, and he asked that strong men be sent to China to teach its people and train up a native ministry, so that within a century China may be entirely a Christian nation.

Sectional conferences on education, prison reform, temperance, capital and labor, international peace, Sabbath observance and other topics were held. A plan of action to be sent to religious and social organizations generally was adopted, emphasizing the importance at this time of interpreting the principles of Christianity in social terms and calling for the cooperation of all the churches in the work of personal evangelism, social service and civic redemption. Comprehensive suggestions for the improvement of family life and also the enlargement and better accomplishment of the functions of the state were included.

Railway Wrecks Come Rapidly

The demand for an appliance to stop railway trains automatically when there is danger of collision has been augmented by two recent wrecks on the seemingly ill-fated New York, New Haven and Hartford road. While the officials of the road were being interrogated by a coroner's jury concerning the recent wreck at Stamford, Connecticut, in which six persons were killed, a passenger train was run into by a fast freight and nine persons were injured, of whom it is believed two will die. This road has a standing offer of $10,000 for an effective automatic stop device. Its officials have, however, been accused of negligence in permitting inexperienced men to operate large passenger locomotives, as well as the equally serious offense of permitting engines to be used on which the air brake apparatus is defective.

Jane Addams Not a Candidate for Chicago Mayoralty

A few months ago there would have been no occasion for a woman soberly to explain that she was not a candidate for the office of mayor of the second largest city in the United States. But when Miss Jane Addams returned from Europe a few days ago the first question she was asked was whether she would stand for the seat of Chicago authority so long held by Carter Harrison, father and son. During her absence abroad the Illinois legislature had given women the right to vote, and the well known head of Hull house was naturally proposed for mayor. Miss Addams also took pains to warn women against rushing forward as candidates for office, now that they are gaining the suffrage, for, she declared, they needed to educate themselves as citizens and voters before becoming office holders. She also deprecated the formation of a "woman's party" as a separate organization.

Women of three Illinois towns had their first opportunity to vote last Saturday. In two places small bond issues were involved, and in the other a municipal election. All three elections were of minor moment, but they aroused some feminine interest.

President A. A. McCormick of the Cook county board (Chicago) says he would like to see a board composed entirely of women commissioners. This board has to do with the penal and charitable institutions of the county.

Churches Invited to Anti-Saloon Convention

An unusual appeal for the appointment of convention delegates is now being sent out to every church in the country, with the notation that it applies independently to the young people's society and to the Sunday school of each congregation, as well as to all temperance organizations of every sort and to Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations. The appeal proceeds from the National Anti-Saloon League, and looks forward to a temperance convention at Columbus, the capital of Ohio, in November next, 10 to 13 inclusive, at which time it is trusted that not less than 20,000 citizens, interested in the suppression of the liquor traffic and each representing a specific constituency at home, will assemble to concert more aggressive war measures against the liquor traffic than have ever been before undertaken.

The Anti-Saloon League has heretofore worked in the direction of local option, and in that policy has incurred the condemnation of some aggressive temperance advocates who have thought it too much disposed to temporize and compromise. But the league has always promised that when the time came it would stand out and out for national prohibition of the whole liquor business. Indeed, its constantly upheld motto has been, "The only solution of the saloon problem is no saloon." And now Dr. Purley E. Baker, the national superintendent of the league, announces that in the judgment of the league's officers the hour for the final aggressive advance has come.

At the November convention he will propose to the assembled delegates plans for a nationwide movement which, it is hoped, will solidify the righteous citizenship of the country in an irresistible demand for an amendment to the national constitution, making the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages forever unlawful within the bounds of the United States. Dr. Baker will point out to the convention that half of the population of the United States now resides in areas where the saloon has been already outlawed, and he believes that the controlling majority within those districts, augmented by the citizenship of like mind in all other localities of the nation, is quite sufficient to constitute an invincible majority of the whole people.

Conference on Mountain Work Permanently Organized

The drawing together of similar denominational interests in interdenominational fellowship goes on until now almost every field of Christian evangelization, education and philanthropy is covered by one of these mutually helpful associations of Christian workers. Perhaps the latest of such organizations is the permanent conference committee just formed by the officers and agents of church boards, independent societies and educational foundations engaged in service for the southern mountaineers. The organization meeting and initial conference for this fellowship was recently held at Atlanta, Georgia. The gathering included representatives from the Presbyterian Home Boards both at New York and Atlanta, and from the similar agencies of Baptists, Disciples, Methodists and Congregationalists, as well as members of the governing boards of the Peabody and Sage funds. The presidents of Berea and Maryville Colleges were also factors of influence in the conference. Different methods of meeting the needs of the mountaineers were frankly compared as to their adaptations and efficiency, and the gentlemen in attendance thought their conclusions were of so much significance that they provided for the publication of the proceedings in pamphlet form. Dr. John E. White of Atlanta, a great Baptist home mission leader, was elected president of the organization.

Seeing with Fresh Eyes

IN AN ADDRESS a little while ago a missionary said that he sometimes wished he had never heard of Christ, so that he might have the delightful surprise that he saw in the faces of men when they were first told the story of the gospel. This which was the amazing fact in all history had become commonplace to him. Someone who was defending sensational preachers, without defending their methods, pointed out a fact with which all ministers have to do, that while the gospel is always "good," it is no longer "news" to a great many people. At any rate, they think they have heard it so often that hearing it again is rather wearisome than otherwise.

There are some very honest ministers who, in their zeal to make the gospel "news," go beyond wisdom, but it is only fair to recognize their effort to make men who have grown hardened to the gospel realize the newness and freshness of it. It would be a Godsend to many of us if we could find a way of seeing the commonplace things of our lives with fresh eyes. The best way open to us is to see them through the eyes of others to whom they are fresh. Many a minister has found his own heart warmed by the enthusiasm of a new convert, who has just come to know the joy of the Christian life, which has settled down into a dull monotony for himself. God keeps the world young by mercifully taking away the generations as they grow old, and replacing them with new generations, to whom the world is still new. They see life with fresh eyes. It is the salvation of history that it is so.

It is worth realizing that this is one of the large values of immigration in American life. Most of us who are habituated to America have lost our sense of the marvel of all that is about us. We have so far overlooked it that our vision is chiefly of the adverse facts. We are thinking of graft, lawlessness, white slavery and all the rest that is evil. Then there come to us men who see with fresh eyes. After all is said, this continues to be the land of opportunity, the land of promise, and not of broken promise either, as has been suggested. Here are the largest liberties the world knows. Here is a chance for a new beginning. Education, art, culture, comfort, all are available for common people beyond the dreams of many in other lands.

Professor Clot, the Waldensian leader, says in his report just published that there will probably be 250,000 new Italian immigrants within the next year coming to America to find their new opportunities. From one point of view that is simply appalling. We Americans sometimes feel that we must rise to the defense of our country. Passing that question just now, can anyone miss the meaning of this as a revelation of the attractiveness of our land? The things that draw are commonplace to us. An Italian young man before a church session said that he found America a beautiful place to him because here nobody hits you on the head. Another said that the best thing in America to him was that if you wanted to go to church and pray and sing and hear a sermon in your own language you could do it, and nobody would keep you from getting work because of it.

In one of her books Mary Antin tells of the thrill that came to her after her arrival in this country, when a little girl, poorly dressed, invited her to go to school with her. When she asked what she would have to do to go, her new friend told her that she would need to do nothing but just come along. The teacher would make a place for her, there would be books and she could go to school without paying for it. It was "incredibly glorious news." Professor Steiner and Jacob Riis have pointed out the same facts. It is the commonplace which these new people see with fresh eyes.

The point of it all for most Continent readers is, that we must shake ourselves out of the dullness of the habit of such fine things. Our religion, our church, our land, are all nothing short of marvelous. They are gloriously incredible. All it will take to make us realize that is to see with fresh eyes. We must see through the eyes of others, or else we must bring ourselves to a new angle of vision. It is an overwhelming pity that we should handle God's best gifts with no thrill from the meaning of them.

Pretty Close to Ultimate Bigotry

High church Episcopalians go on year after year from one stage of incredible narrowness to another more narrow and less conceivable. And apparently their souls shrink meanwhile in a ratio to accommodate this unhappy progress, for the smug comfort of their self-satisfaction is not diminished by the closer pinch of their contracting ideas. As is usual, the synod of the diocese of Toronto connected with the Anglican Church in Canada was this year in session simultaneously with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, which this time chanced to meet in the same city. And as usual a fraternal greeting to the Presbyterians was moved in the Episcopalian synod. But the unusual incident was a determined fight made by high churchmen present to prevent the passage of the resolution. The allusion in it to "closer cooperation of Christian people" was held by these preposterous bigots to "cheapen their church and its episcopate." Of course, the greetings were adopted in spite of such opposition, but the high churchmen did succeed in mingling a drop of gall with what should have been a brimming cup of the milk of human—not to say Christian—kindness.

But there is this happy thing about it all—the high churchmen of the Episcopalian body are doing good by their very extravagance and absurdity. Through wholesome reactions of disgust they are driving the sensible majority into a more generous position.

The Church Can't Afford to Lose Him

Charles Stelzle by cutting himself off from the organized work of the Presbyterian Church may be said to have committed mayhem on the social service arm of the denomination. The hand on that arm is not all gone, of course, but it is crippled enough to spoil a good deal of its grip. And certainly the church will feel the misfortune of it throughout its organism.

The Continent has but lately expressed its opinion of the preeminent importance of what Mr. Stelzle has done, not for the Presbyterian Church alone but for the whole family of evangelical denominations, within the last ten years. It is needless now to repeat that estimate and analysis in detail, but we must say again that no other one man within this past decade has so widely affected Protestant thinking as he. And few other men in America have so widely affected general social thinking as he.

Of course his withdrawal from the Home Board of the church is not a withdrawal from Presbyterianism, and still less from organized Christianity. And we mean not at all to imply that the change of the sphere of his activity cancels what he has done in the ten years past, or destroys his present influence over church people. Yet making all allowances on this side of the question, it still remains true, in The Continent's opinion, that the church very decidedly needs the continuance of Mr. Stelzle's labors and influence in the very heart of its ecclesiastical organization. Of course even as a board officer he cannot be confined—as he has not been confined—to denominational relations. But that is all the more a reason why he should continue a church official, because the church official who reaches beyond his church is more useful to the church than the man whom church lines can bound.

It should be well understood that the Home Board has not been indifferent to the value of Mr. Stelzle's services. The very extreme of every possible effort has been put forth by the members of the board and by its secretaries to change Mr. Stelzle's determination to retire. And the church will surely expect the board to continue its efforts to retain or regain Mr. Stelzle, in spite of the fact of his having announced his retirement as decisive. If Mr. Stelzle has not found liberties enough in his board relations to accomplish all his ideals, the board will do well to give him all liberty he asks, for up to this time the ideals of Charles Stelzle have been found to work invariably in favor of a progressive statesmanship which the church has pursued to its own enlargement and to the extension of religion in the world.

Plenty of Room for Women in Both Churches

United Presbyterian women were really the only folks who spoke out against church union while the three General Assemblies were in simultaneous session lately in Atlanta. They had somehow got the idea that Southern Presbyterians don't like women's mission boards and other modern devices that set women free to do things in the church. And inasmuch as the women of United Presbyterianism are very much in love with their own boards in particular, and with liberty in general, they sent a telegram to Atlanta which said in undubious effect that there wasn't going to be any feminine consent to any union which abridged feminine organization in the merged church.

Of course the United Assembly with fervid gallantry immediately responded that the same were its sentiments, too, and that allayed the good ladies' transient anxieties. But they would have been even more at ease if they could at the same time have had a glimpse into the delightful "first annual meeting of the Women's Council of the Presbyterian Church in the United States," which was going on sweetly and joyously in Atlanta all during Assembly days there. This was not called a board to be sure, but it was all the substance of the same thing. The superintendent, Mrs. Winsborough, is a board secretary in everything but formal title. And this enlargement is not what somebody else obtained for these loyal Presbyterian women but what they got for themselves by stirring up the chivalry which in their fathers and husbands is an attribute far more reliable to count upon than the conservatism so often regarded as the first ecclesiastical virtue of the South.

The United Presbyterian women therefore need not dread that their sisters of the South are enslaved to traditions of masculine autocracy any more than themselves. There is not a church in Christendom today—not even the Southern Presbyterian Church, with all its famously effective laymen's movement—which can come within sight of supporting its missionary work without the aid of the ladies. And that signifies, by a law more potent than all the statutes of all ecclesiasticism on earth, that the ladies can have anything they want.

No, indeed, there's not the slightest syllable of reason for fearing that union of United and Southern Presbyterians will crowd the women and their missionary organizations into a dark and neglected corner. There is never any reason for fearing the impossible.

In all the unending back-and-forth of talk about faith and doubt in the church a vast deal of all that's said goes for nothing with the discriminating because it plunges into the question at the wrong end. The place to begin is with faith, not with doubt. What the church is here for is to create faith. The great calculation, therefore, which vitally concerns it, is the amount of faith which has been produced by its ministrations. The right of a man to belong to the church or to preach its gospel is determinable only by measuring his faith. Yet the everlastingly repeated blunder of those who think they are conserving the doctrinal truth of the church is to go around rating and marking men by the measure of their doubts.

What a man doubts is of significance only in comparison with what he believes. It is entirely possible—it frequently happens, in fact—that a man who doubts much is a far better Christian than a man who doesn't doubt at all. For very often the man who doesn't doubt at all doesn't believe at all—that is, he has no belief dynamic enough to make him do anything worth while for his kingdom. On the other hand, a man with more doubts is in many cases able to throw all those doubts into the background, where they do not interfere at all with his force as a servant of Christ, because the mighty motive truths of religion which he absolutely believes are big enough to drive him headlong into Christian service. And that kind of man, you will notice if you follow him, loses his uncertainties very soon, for the thing happens to him which the Master promised—by doing the will of God he learns to know of the doctrine. So this sort of Christian is a much more hopeful kind than the professed religionist who believes everything with his head, but never lets anything get enough hold of his heart to move him.

If you are sizing up any man for heresy, estimate what he does believe before you subtract from it what he doesn't believe. Very often you will find the subtrahend making mighty little difference with the big minuend.

—There is at least one country in the world where Calvinism is not out of date, and that is Holland. There the Calvinists are a political party strong enough to elect eleven members of parliament. Just what the political platform of Calvinists is or ought to be The Continent confesses it does not know. Theologically Calvinism is deemed conservative in these days, but Calvin in his own time was a great deal of a radical, both in church and state. We observe, however, that the political Calvinists among the Dutch sit on the right of the parliamentary chamber, beside twenty-five Catholic clericals, and therefore one would judge that, to say the least, they are not Rooseveltian progressives.

—The Continent wonders if any Presbyterian pastor has yet put into effect Dr. Sauber's recommendation as adopted by the Atlanta Assembly, that the minister of every congregation should make an effort to put a church paper into every home in the parish. There is a mighty deal of sense in that recommendation—more than The Continent's modesty permits it to expound fully. But at least it is open for The Continent to declare in advance its unlimited admiration for the man or men who, in these days of summer reflection and planning, may be bold enough to put Dr. Sauber's suggestion at the top or near the top of their proposed working program for next autumn.

—Advertising and Selling is a technical magazine which circulates only in limited trade lines. That may be all right for most of its material, but it is a pity that one article in its June number—George S. Fowler's "The Morbid Sex-Story and Undesirable Circulation-Building"—cannot be read by every magazine reader in the land. Mr. Fowler, speaking as an advertising man, voices the unqualified opinion that an advertiser with a conscience ought to refuse to patronize any magazine that prints indecently suggestive stories for the sake of booming newsstand sales. Publishers are making a great point these days of compelling advertisers to be truthful. Mr. Fowler thinks it time for advertisers to turn round and compel the publishers to be respectable. The Continent hopes the suggestion will take hold where it will do good. And please notice that it is just as applicable to subscription patronage.

—Apropos of recent discussion touching the extent of Mormon influence in Montana, it is interesting to observe in The Livingstone Enterprise of that state an interview with Melvin J. Ballard, supervisor of Mormon churches in the Northwest, who is quoted as saying that the church authorities propose to settle in Montana soon three large colonies of their people in the Three Forks, Lewistown and Billings districts. According to Mr. Ballard, Mormon settlers are dissatisfied in both Canada and Mexico, and the church government at Salt Lake, thinking it better to bring the restless ones back to the United States, considers that Montana offers more advantages than any other region for colonization just now. He claims a 300 per cent Mormon increase in the state in the last four years, which is, of course, since the last religious census was taken.

—The act of the last Illinois legislature which made it unlawful to sell intoxicating liquors anywhere within four miles of the state university is a piece of legislation that ought to be imitated in every state in the union which supports a university of this character. Whoever else may be able to afford the drink habit, it is certian that college students are not safe trifling with it, and if the state is paternal anywhere, it surely ought to take its university students as its best cherished wards. Perhaps the cities where the universities are located may be inclined to think their liberties abridged by such an enactment (though in the Illinois case both towns affected were dry already by their own vote), but if it comes to a pinch anywhere, any of these municipalities will forego its saloons in preference to giving up its university.

—The referendum doubtless usually works for good government, but The Continent discovers one case where it is manifestly working ill. The last California legislature, largely under the influence of the state's stalwart lieutenant governor, Mr. Wallace, passed a "red light" law designed to clean up by injunction the awful Barbary Coast in San Francisco. But now the ghouls who profit by commercialized vice there have succeeded in getting up a referendum petition, which stops the enforcement of the law until it can be voted on by the people. The people will doubtless indorse it, but the law is nullified until a year from next November, anyhow.

—The Methodist theological seminary in Boston marches with the times in devoting the work of one full professorship wholly to the church's duty in social service. And it has just called to that chair Rev. Harry F. Ward, who first proved out himself by an effective evangelistic ministry in the stock yards district of Chicago, and has since served as general secretary for the Methodist social service commission. In this latter capacity he has exerted great influence through his lectures to labor unions, in which he never fails to include the evangelistic note.

—The Toronto Presbyterian compliments the "big three" who came from the United States to address the recent Presbyterian congress in Toronto, naming them in this order: Dr. Warren H. Wilson, the country life expert of the Home Board in New York City; Dr. Graham Taylor of Chicago Commons and J. Campbell White of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Dr. Wilson's address, says The Presbyterian, "will stand as one of the mountain tops of the whole program." His theme was "The Spiritual Crisis in Farming."

Permanency of the Praying Church

BY WILLIAM PIERSON MERRILL

"O where are kings and empires now,
Of old that went and came?
But, Lord, thy church is praying yet,
A thousand years the same."

THAT is not mere sentiment or pious fancy, it is the surest of the facts of history. The kingdoms of gold, silver, brass and iron "went and came"; where are they now? But the stone cut from the mountain has grown and is filling the earth; the latest nation to arise from sleep and greet the new day turns for help not to the mighty empires that have been—they are dead—but to the church that began to pray when Rome was mighty, and is "praying yet," long after Rome has fallen.

Nineteen centuries ago there were two great forces operating in the world of men; one of them was seen, the other was unseen. The one was mighty, majestic, imperial, the sum of outward strength, the dominating force in the life of the world. Its roads and cities, its armies and courts, its codes of law and methods of administration were the great facts of life as men saw it.

The Unseen Life That Outlasted Solid Might

What was the other? No one saw it. The kingdom of God came not with observation. It was a life, a fellowship with God. A Son of Man came and lived, marvelously yet very simply, in a tiny province of the Roman empire. And he told men that their way to true happiness and to that redemption for which the world longed lay through the life with God. He founded no organization, he wrote no laws. He only set in motion hidden forces of spiritual life. Men caught from him the habit of prayer, of life with God. Little groups gathered in prayer together to the common Father. They believed, they loved, they prayed. Would anyone have said that that unseen life of prayer would outlast the solid might of Rome? Yet, before long, men ceased to reckon time from the year that the imperial city was founded, and began to count the years from the birth of the Lord of the Spirit. The barbarians from the North overwhelmed Rome, and men said the end of the world had come. But the church was "praying yet"; the barbarians caught the Christ life, and a new world and a greater began to rise from the wreck of the old. The church itself began to think more of the seen than of the unseen, and grew to imperial greatness, dominating the world. But that outward might decayed and passed away, while, unseen, the life of the spirit, the praying church, went on, producing new forms, the most vital, growing force in the world.

Men have tried to give shape to this unseen reality, this prayer life of the true church of Christ, to give it final form in creeds and institutions; but ever it has escaped, leaving them with the empty shells in their hands, while the life went on unseen. So this invisible, intangible, indefinable life of the spirit has grown, kindled from soul to soul, till, in the last century, it has passed all bounds of race and place, and now China, coming out into the light of modern thought and action, turns to the men who have caught the Christ life, the men who have learned to live with God, and cries, "Brethren, pray for us!" All the splendid world of the seen, seemingly so strong and so real, has passed like a film of a moving picture; but through it all the light has shone and grown, the light of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, more real, more permanent, unseen though it be, than all the kings and empires, and laws, and armies that proudly claim to be the real interests of the world.

Is not this message of the reality and vitality of the spiritual a message we greatly need? We have been living in an age that has been too ready to think that the material is the real and the spiritual a shadow, a fancy. The influence of that age is still strong. Men do not feel that the part of life with which the church deals is as real as the part with which business deals. The spiritual sense cannot wholly die, for "man is incurably religious"; but it is deadened, clouded. We see God with an effort, and, as the vision fades, we begin to doubt and wonder and criticise. We assume that the things that are seen are real, and the things that are not seen imaginary. Prayer has lost its vividness. We do not pray with that sense of reality with which we work. The spiritual world seems vague, misty, a realm of shadows and cloud shapes. We follow Jesus in his teaching and healing far more readily than in his communion with his Father.

A Heathen Appeal for Spiritual Strength

And, as we thus doubt and wonder and grope in the mists of our own making, there comes to us, from a people we have called heathen, a cry for help. We have heard appeals from the same race in the past for bread, for money to save the people from famine. How quickly we responded! That was an appeal for something real, we felt, something which we could do. But now they say, "We need light, guidance, spiritual strength and wisdom, that we may build our republic wisely and strongly. You believe in God, who is Light, who is Spirit, who answers prayer. Pray for us." Shall not such a cry arouse us from our lethargy, dissipate the unreality that clouds our spiritual life, and bring back to us the joy of unclouded communion with God?

The best remedy for doubts about prayer is to be set at praying. A man was walking along the bank of a river, questioning and doubting whether life were worth living. All at once he heard a cry. Someone had fallen in the stream and was in danger of drowning. He ran to the spot, plunged in, used his living strength and skill for the rescue of the drowning man; and when he stood on the shore his doubts were gone. He knew that life was real and worth living when he heard that cry. So all our doubts and questions about prayer and the reality of the spiritual life are swept away when our brothers in China ask us to pray for them.

Do you recall Whittier's poem of "The Two Rabbis"? Each had sinned, and had tried to pray for forgiveness and peace. But no answer came; the prayer seemed unreal, and God very far away. Each started to find the other, to ask his prayers. When they met they fell on their knees; each forgot himself in praying for his friend.

"And when at last they rose up to embrace.
Each saw God's pardon in his brother's face."

This is the weakness of our Christianity today, that, even in our churches, even in the hearts and to the minds of sincere Christians, the things of the world seem real and big and worth while, and the things of the spirit seem misty and uncertain and of doubtful practical value. We have a wonderfully complete and clear knowledge of the world God has made; but we must learn to see God in it and through it. For knowledge passes away, and only the life with God endures. May this call that has come from the men who must build the new China to their brothers who have learned to pray not only bring to the doing of that difficult task of statesmanship the divine guidance and strength and unselfishness essential to its success; but may it also give to the church of Christ throughout the world a new impulse to prayer, a new sense of the reality of the unseen, a new confidence that the mightiest force and the most lasting reality in the world is not outward might and power, but the Spirit of God. For cities grow and decay, empires rise and fall, churches and creeds change, and all that is seen grows mighty but to die; but beneath all outward change, unseen, quiet, goes on "the life of God in the soul of man," living and growing from age to age, the one great reality in a world of forms. The republics of today may pass as the empires of old; but far off in the future, when men look back on the greatness of the dominant nations of this time as we now look back on the "grandeur that was Rome," still can the song be sung,

"Lord, thy church is praying yet,
A thousand years the same."

Put Vital Strength Into Service of Unseen

Oh, men and women who believe in Christ, live in his faith that God and the life with him is the supreme reality; and let more and more of your vital strength go into the service of the things that are unseen and eternal. And count it a call from your God to the truest and best use of your life when a man or a nation, just coming to consciousness of the need of God, and knowing that you profess to know him, cries out to you:

"Pray for my soul; more things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of; wherefore let thy voice
Rise like a fountain for me night and day,
For what are men better than sheep or goats,
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves, and those who call them friends?
For so the whole round earth is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God."

No one sees those golden chains of prayer. But they are stronger than steel, and outlast the mightiest and proudest works of men. "For the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal."

A Leader of Scotch Religious Thought

BY HOWARD W. JOHNSTON

James Denney, known for his connection with the United Free Church College of Glasgow, is at once preacher, professor, author and tireless worker for the kingdom. His scholarship and character have been recognized on both sides of the Atlantic. One of his pithy sayings opened The Continent's "first page" editorial in the issue of June 26

"NO MAN can incline his way in the slightest degree to the will of God without having a flood of light shine round about him that all the learning in the world cannot afford." A simple, straightforward statement of the truth; such as almost any preacher might use, but in this case the words were from the lips of Professor James Denney, D. D., the best living authority on New Testament exegesis in the English-speaking world. Simplicity and earnestness were his chief marks as he continued his sermon.

It was a cold, wet, stormy night; the church was poorly lighted, indifferently filled with an audience not remarkably attentive, but those who listened were conscious of a message coming right from the heart of the gospel.

The spirit of the man is revealed best, however, in the classroom. Respect is the word that characterizes the students; intensity denotes the professor. No matter how boisterous any other classroom is, there is nothing of the kind ever shows itself there. Some students, mostly first year men, do "cut" occasionally, but I heard a second year man say recently he "didn't cut any more, for it seemed to him like cutting a slice out of his life to miss Denney."

The prayer before the lecture is indeed a prayer, asking that God will "deliver us from all pride, or indolence, or fear; that Christ may become more real to us and that his Spirit may work in us that which is well pleasing in his sight."

The lecture begins, striking deep at the first stroke. One can fancy he hears the swish of a blade as the speaker encounters opposition, or some philosophy, falsely so called, of interpretation. Dr. Denney is always fair, but sometimes merciless. Still pardon is freely granted, for one discovers before long that he is a champion for truth as it is in the New Testament and not as it fashions itself in some twentieth century brain. The lecture advances steadily, powerfully on to the close of the hour. The benediction is pronounced, all quietly withdraw, evidently impressed not so much by the exhibition of scholarship, which is amazing, but by what riches there are to be found in the word of God.

James Denney, D. D.

One might gather from the foregoing that Dr. Denney strives for effect; but nothing could be farther from his mind. He is a Worker, spelled with a capital W. They tell the story that once some students, his guests for the evening, were excitedly telling the doctor about their recent football victory, in which he did not seem overly interested, and during a pause he remarked in his quiet, intense way: "When I was a student we didn't have such things. We worked!" Evidently he always has been a worker and always will be. They say that in this generation there are only ten men who have graduated from Glasgow University with double honors, and Dr. Denney is one of that notable ten.

"Jesus and the Gospel" His Best Work

Anyone who is familiar with The British Weekly, or The Expositor, cannot help but marvel at the number of book reviews appearing over the initials "J. D." Nor are they superficial; they show study. The fact that Dr. Denney is a voluminous writer is, of course, well known. I think he regards his "Jesus and the Gospel" as his best work; certainly many of his admirers do, but there still remains much to choose from.

His duties at the college, his preaching and his literary work do not preclude his doing the full work of a presbyter. I believe he is what we would call in America the chairman of the home mission committee of Glasgow Presbytery; he is a faithful member of the Generaly Assembly's committee on church union (quite an important question in Scotland now); he has charge of the local contributions for the Million Shilling Fund for Foreign Missions; he is apparently chairman of every important religious meeting in the city that courts public favor —and how he finds time for it all is a wonder.

No picture is complete without some lighter shades appearing. I recall with keenest pleasure an evening a few of us spent recently in his home Dr. Denney keeps up the custom of inviting his students to dine with him. During the dinner, as well as later in the drawing room, everyone in the company was led somehow to be at his very best. The conversation turned now this way and now that, everybody was happy, and each guest came away delighted with himself, but more so with his host.

The better one comes to know him the more clearly is perceived the spirit of another great worker, who said of himself, "I am less than the least of all the apostles; yet labored I more abundantly than they all." Perhaps nothing expresses his life better than the statement he made the other morning in the classroom when he was commenting on Paul's doctrine of the cross: "I can't see how we contrive to live a life that has no crosses and persuade ourselves we are followers of the Nazarene."

Chaffing a Persian Brigand

Rev. Frederick G. Coan, nephew of the famous Dr. Titus Coan (the great missionary who Christianized the Hawaiian islands), is spending this year at home on furlough from his devoted work in Persia. The addresses which he has been making among the churches are very interestingly flavored with the spice of adventure. Most dramatic of all his stories is his experience with a highwayman on a remote mountain road as he was returning from one of his itinerating tours. The tale loses a great deal of its thrill inevitably when repeated apart from the personality of Dr. Coan, but it is a good story even in cold type.

The road down which Dr. Coan was riding on the day of the incident was barely wide enough for the wary feet of his mule. It would have been impossible either to pass another traveler or to turn around on the narrow shelf of rock along which the animal had to pick its way. So there was nothing to do but stop when a brawny mountaineer stood out in the pathway from behind a bend in the road. The Persian, an evil specimen, advanced on the missionary with gleaming knife upraised in his hand. The sight was not a reassuring one certainly, but Dr. Coan, determining to make the best of the situation, smiled broadly at the fellow and asked gently:

"What are you going to do?"

The reply was gruff and unmistakably serious enough: "I am going to kill you."

Dr. Coan continued to smile.

"What are you grinning at? This is no laughing matter," growled the brigand, coming close.

Dr. Coan knew it wasn't, but he couldn't think of anything else to do that would be any more appropriate.

"Why do you want to kill me, anyhow? I never harmed you."

"No, I know you didn't, but I don't want you traveling along this road," was the surly answer.

The missionary was the personification of politeness.

"I didn't know you would have any objection," he murmured soothingly. "I am sure that if you will show me any other road to go on I should be most happy to go that way. Shall we go back and look for another road?"

The missionary knew that the Persian would never be able to back that mule up the hill to the summit, and the Persian knew it too. Impatiently the rascal brandished his knife again.

"No, quit your grinning; I'm going to kill you right here. I haven't killed anybody for thirty days."

Dr. Coan held himself without the flicker of a muscle and went on imperturbably:

"Well, if that is so, I don't see why you might not as well make it thirty-one days. And I would certainly be obliged to you if you could put off the killing for another day. My wife and children are waiting for me down in Urumia, and I am sure they will feel greatly indebted to you if you will let me go on by and get home to them this evening, when they are expecting me."

The highwayman moved a step nearer: "No, I'll do nothing of the kind. I tell you I am going to kill you right here and now."

"Oh, well, in that case, all right!" answered Dr. Coan. "But really there is no hurry about it; I won't go away. So before you kill me I wish you would give a better reason for it. I don't like to be killed for no reason at all."

Perhaps the robber saw a glimmer of humor in the situation; perhaps he was still in deadly earnest, as he answered grimly:

"I want to see what color your blood is."

Anyhow, it was the chance for which the missionary was waiting.

"Oh!" he said, smiling again, "if that is all, I can soon show you that. Just let me get my penknife."

Like a flash Dr. Coan's right hand traveled back to his hip pocket, and before the brigand had a dream of what was happening he was looking straight into the muzzle of the finest possible specimen of an up-to-date American automatic revolver. The fellow knew what it was without any explanation, and he dropped his knife on the instant.

"What are you going to do?" he whined.

Dr. Coan made no sign to show he was enjoying the situation any more than a moment before.

"I am going to kill you," he replied calmly. "It has been considerably over thirty days since I killed anybody."

"Don't do that," begged the freebooter; "I have a wife and children; they need me."

"It's only been a minute or so since you didn't seem to think much of that argument. It looks to me as if there was no call for me to put off killing you on that account."

"But it won't do you any good to kill me," the Persian went on pleading; "what do you want to kill me for?"

"Want to see the color of your blood."

The brigand fairly screamed: "It's red! I tell you it's red!"

"Oh, is it?" said the missionary, now at greater pains not to smile than he had been before to produce a smile. "Well, well, if that is so, that's all I wanted! Now turn square around and march on down the road ahead of me."

The Persian was more than happy to obey. At the foot of the defile the missionary watched him out of sight in one direction and then himself quietly rode off in another; headed homeward.

The Mortgage on Martin Kenzie's Brains

And How His Mother Innocently Forced a Foreclosure

BY AILEEN CLEVELAND HIGGINS

PART I.

"I THOUGHT somethin' would keep it from happenin'," said Mrs. Kenzie, squinting at the calendar, "but nothin' has turned up yet, and I guess nothin' is likely to now in the next five months. It's bound to happen, Martin."

Her son twisted in his invalid's chair and threw his book down with a slam upon the white pine floor. He began poking irritably at his cushions, grimly setting his teeth at the consequent pain, then looking up helplessly at his mother as she stood looking out the window at their little back yard. There was no need to ask her what she was talking about. "It" could mean only one thing—the foreclosure of the mortgage upon their little tumbledown house. The thought of this foreclosure had been darkening their minds for many months, each one leaving gloomier impress than the last.

It seemed to Martin as he regarded his mother that her shoulders drooped more pathetically than usual. As she turned, with the spring sunlight full upon her in its clear afternoon intensity, he caught sight of new lines in the deep network of wrinkles about her eyes and mouth. When she walked across the floor he noted that none of the old buoyancy remained in her step. How old she was growing—his sprightly, wiry little mother who used to be, until "it" began to worry her, so inexhaustibly merry and full of youth!

"It's gettin' the best of me, Martin," she went on hopelessly. "It's takin' all the heart out of me."

Her attitude as she stopped, arms limp at her sides, in the middle of the room, would have been ludicrous to any but Martin's eyes. As if in perverse mockery, endless worry and hard work had set their stamp upon her with the exaggeration of caricature. Heedless of their parents' charge "not to make fun of poor old Mrs. Kenzie," the children of the little town, highly diverted by her queer little figure, giggled among themselves whenever she passed and alluded to her as "Mrs. Skimpums," a name as rich in entertainment to their imaginations as Old Mother Hubbard, Cinderella or any one of the fascinating poverty-stricken characters they read about in books. Indeed, Mrs. Kenzie was scarcely more real to them than these imaginary folk—so far did the silent tragedy of her life remove her from the living personalities which were within their childish comprehension. Her struggle had distorted her, soul and body.

Sick at heart, Martin regarded her as she stood there in despair.

"Don't, mother," he cried impetuously, "don't give up like that!"

She came over to his chair and wheeled it a little nearer to the window. Her hand closed over his and very gently she smoothed his swollen fingers in silence. It was not often that she spoke of the mortgage, because she wanted to save her son all the anxiety within her power. Now it was as if despair had driven her to speak freely.

"Mebbe," she continued presently, "mebbe I wouldn't feel like this if I hadn't been so willin', Martin—so willin' to do just anythin' to ward off the foreclosin' of the mortgage. Why, I could stand anythin' in the world if it meant savin' this little place of ours, but it seems like nothin' I could do amounted to anythin'. I couldn't no more'n make a livin' for us with all my washin' and ironin' and chickens and garden truck, and you not havin' all the med'cine and doctor's care you really need at that."

"Don't, don't, mother!" Martin burst forth again. "It's more than I can stand to hear you say anything about me. Who is to blame for the mortgage? Whose fault is it you've worked yourself to death? If it hadn't been for that year at college you gave me we wouldn't have any mortgage. And the worst of it is, mother, I can't forget what you said when you signed the papers and gave them to Mr. Ripley."

"What was that, Martin?" questioned Mrs. Kenzie blankly. "I don't recollec' anythin' in partic'lar."

"It was when Mr. Ripley said, 'It's a pity, ma'am, that you have to mortgage your home to send your boy off to school—a great pity, and considerable of a risk!' Then you spoke up as quick as a flash:

"'No risk at all, Mr. Ripley. I've got a mortgage myself that makes it safe for me to sign these papers to you. I have a mortgage on Martin's brains. Now, who would want better security than that?'

"Mr. Ripley laughed hard at your odd idea.

"'A mortgage on brains, eh?' he said, turning to me and looking at me as if he were taking stock of me. 'Well, well, let's hope the boy won't disappoint you, ma'am. You had enough putting up with his worthless father. Let's hope the boy won't turn out to be another Jim Kenzie.'

"He meant it kindly enough, I suppose, but you flared up in a second.

"'Jim would 've been all right if he just hadn't been so unfortunate in everything he turned his hand to,' you said; 'seems like everything was set against him.'

"You always did believe in father, you know, mother, up to the very last, and I suppose it was faith something like you had in him that made you so confident about taking a mortgage on my brains. I felt proud when you told Mr. Ripley that and I was as sure as you were that everything would turn out all right. I never dreamed of being a failure. I believed in myself as much as you did. I thought if I could just go off to college I could do wonders! All the year I was in college the thought that my brains were mortgaged made me work hard and try to make the most of everything. And now—oh, mother, to think it has turned out so different from what I thought! Rheumatism pounced on me as soon as I left college and crippled me up so I couldn't do anything. Your mortgage on my brains has proved worth nothing at all. I'm worse than a failure—I'm just a burden, not able to do anything but sit here and read and, when my fingers don't hurt too much, write a few letters."

"Why, Martin—hush! You mustn't say such things!" exclaimed his mother in consternation. "You would have been all right if you just hadn't got sick—things would have gone along as smooth as silk."

Martin buried his face against her with a half sob.

"But they didn't, mother—they didn't——"

"There, there, Martin," she soothed, "we'll not talk about it any more—not just now. Let's take a turn out in the yard and see how the garden things are beginning to come out."

"If you are not too tired, mother," Martin said, trying to keep the tragic note out of his voice.

"I'm not tired a mite," she responded quickly.

She pinned her little checked shawl about her shoulders, brought him his cap and wrapped a quilt about him, then wheeled him out into the sunshine.

"It's a little chilly yet, but spring's come for sure and certain," she commented cheerily. "Look at the bees a-wheedlin' the buds already and the vine a-startin' to dress up the picket fence."

His despondency acted like a whiplash to her courage. As she rolled his chair here and there to visit their favorite spots in the yard she did her best by her drolleries to win the smiles back to her son's face.

"You're a trump, mother!" he exclaimed finally, laughing aloud in response to her will.

"A trump, Martin? What in the nation is that? One of the things you learned off at college, I reckon. I guess there's no end to what you learned there. Dear me, if only you could've gone on and finished! Well, well—anyhow, Martin, I want you to know that I've never begrudged you that year of college no matter if things are as they are. I said we wouldn't talk about it any more, but I want you to know the way I feel about it. Mebbe you'll feel better yourself, Martin, if you realize that never for one minute have I wished I hadn't mortgaged the place to send you off to school. When you was born, Martin, in this little town off the railroad, tucked off here in the Mississippi valley away from everythin'. I said to myself, 'Now, he didn't have one word to say about where he'd like to be born. I guess if he had, it wouldn't have been in this place, where young folks ain't got no chance to be more'n those before 'em. I'll see that he gets his chance.' And that's why I sent you off to school, and I've never been anythin' but glad of it—no matter if folks did talk about it and say poor people like us had no business thinkin' about college."

"And you're glad, mother—even if my mortgaged brains haven't brought you enough to buy a loaf of bread?" Martin asked, looking up at her quizzically.

"Now, you be quiet about that, Martin," she returned, patting him on the shoulder. "You can't help your rheum'tism—your grandfather used to have it terr'ble and I reckon that's where it comes from. You ain't respons'ble for what's handed down to you like that, Martin, so you jest stop frettin' over what ain't no fault of your own. Don't think any more about it. Mebbe I oughtn't to 've brought the subjec' up again, but I couldn't help it, for fear you might be grievin' yourself over somethin' that wasn't in my mind at all. I feel better myself for speakin' out—sort of like I'd broke up a cold. I guess it don't do folks any good to keep things to themselves too much. Now, let's not think about anythin', only jes' that it's spring and we're out o' doors together. It's nice, Martin, to be with you—I have to leave you alone so much when I work. It's pitiful as can be to see you a-settin' there hour after hour tryin' to amuse yourself readin' books and writin' letters. I'm that glad we can get out today together."

Martin gave himself, with her, to the charms of the afternoon, and like two children they went about in quest of the new-old surprises of spring which made their little yard a wonder world. The garden most of all allured them. It was a generous garden—with room for lad's love, verbenas, mignonette, marjoram and all companionable flowers, besides the vegetables.

"Seems like there never was earth as rich as this," said Mrs. Kenzie, stooping to poke about some rosebushes. "Things just can't help growin' here."

The Kenzie flowers and vegetables and fruits had taken prizes, ever since Martin could remember, at the Illinois valley fair, the yearly carnival of the county—four days of red balloons, horse races, side shows, acrobats and endless exhibits of country products. Certainly the gods never tasted ambrosia more delicious than the sweets from the Kenzie garden. Their peaches and apples took on a rich glow, bestowed as a special gift, it appeared, by the gentle sun which seemed to shine just for them, and stored away in Mrs. Kenzie's pantry were amber jellies, spiced sirups and sweet conserves.

Martin kept his mother busy telling over the history of their garden—how she planted the cherry trees in the moonlight to get them "started off right," how she tended to the rose that won first prize at the fair, how she first got "real well acquainted with the white lilies," and "learned to understand the poppies." He plied her with question after question about the quaint garden lore and philosophy which she had learned "between times" when she was not fighting poverty and trying to shelter her indolent husband from the harsh criticism of the townspeople.

"I don't know what's the matter with me today, Martin," she said finally. "Here I am talkin' a blue streak about things I've never spoke to a livin' soul before. These things must sound terr'ble foolish to you——"

"No, they don't, mother," Martin answered quickly. "That story you made up about the narcissus beats the one I learned in mythology all to pieces. You're different from anyone I ever heard talk—why, you're more interesting than any of the people in the books I've been reading."

"Pshaw, Martin, you must be crazy! People in books are smart——"

"Some of them are and some of them aren't—I've been studying the different kinds a good deal."

His mother looked at him admiringly.

"It must be grand, Martin, to understand what's in books like you do. I'm that proud of havin' such a smart son who can read and understand——"

Martin lifted her hand suddenly to his lips in a way that took her breath for a moment, then after a keen look at his face decided her to take him back into the house.

"You're feverish, I do believe, Martin," she commented anxiously. "Your eyes are a-shinin' so and your cheeks are red as fire. I've upset you talkin' about the mortgage, then runnin' on like I have about everythin'. I'm goin' to take you right back in."

The Inspirational in Church Architecture

BY HARRY W. JONES

THE FIRST decade of the twentieth century has shown a marked improvement in the church architecture of this country. But this is only the beginning. Few churches, other than the ecclesiastical, indicate a keen appreciation of those qualities which constitute a worthy Christian architecture. Types which inspire a spirit of worship, and which have their distinct message, are comparatively few.

An analysis of our denominational churches in this country will explain somewhat the cause of our architectural shortcomings. Denominations, desiring freedom of thought, withdrawing from the parent church, were at first antagonistic to it, even to avoiding reminiscence in its architecture. With comparatively little money, and with no coercive powers to obtain it, the sole income being not from tithes, nor from the state, but from an optional pew rental and the contribution box, it is not strange that the desire for appropriate church architecture has grown slowly.

The building of churches has seldom been from religious fervor or from waves of thankfulness such as created some of the churches in the middle ages, but rather the construction has been a deliberate effort of a comparatively small body of people, working within limited bounds and assisted by only occasional munificence. In America the early church and the town hall were sometimes one structure, or, if not, they could often be mistaken for each other; for as Christianity first avoided the forms of paganism, so the denominational church avoided the forms of ecclesiasticism. Limited in number and in funds, avoiding tradition and deprived of the inspiration of well designed churches about them, possibly without architects of religious fervor, what wonder that the expression of architecture in the churches of America should have been crude and chaotic?

We have the spectacle of communities of people attacking the serious problem without previous knowledge or experience, at the same time trying to make both ends meet and to appear to be doing a greater piece of work than their conditions justified. The immediate result of such conditions has been unintelligent imitation. The only remedy for these conditions is for each problem to be carefully considered, each structure planned and designed with the prime motive of its being a place in which to worship Almighty God; associating possibly with it some symbol of the church to denote its purpose, and so to work out a natural solution with simplicity, affectation being absolutely debarred.

The unecclesiastical church interior is focused upon its pulpit, instead of upon the altar. It is, however, possible to so place the communion table as a central feature, possibly upon a raised platform or stylobate, as to take the place of the altar, with the reading desk and pulpit on either side. As the sermon, in most instances, is considered more important than the ritual, it seems desirable that all of the congregation shall readily see, as well as hear, the minister.

There are many things which help to constitute that which shall give a worshipful and religious atmosphere in the planning, the construction, the interior design, the windows and the decoration. Often the simplest and most inexpensive methods are most effective in attaining this result. There are many things which on general principles are to be studiously avoided; among these are the corner pulpit, the too steeply sloping floors, square ceilings and strong contrasts in tone of furnishings and decorations. One of the most disastrous effects has been gained by too hodge-podge an assortment of memorial windows, sometimes involving very great expense.

In fine, there may and should be that about every church which should cause the worshiper to forget the world without and to inspire in him a spirit of true worship

Belonged at the Door

Preparations were going on for the funeral of a colored resident in a southern town, alleges a newspaper story teller. As the negro undertaker bustled in and out of the house his progress was somewhat impeded by the body of a small colored youth who had taken his position in the doorway.

"Move on, niggah, move on," ordered the undertaker, pompously, "an' quit projeckin' yo'se'f 'roun' heah whah yo' ain't wanted."

"Move on' nothin'," was the answer, as the boy backed against the doorjamb. "I's de crepe."

"So you claim to be a literary man, eh?" "Yes, sir; I wrote that book, 'A Dozen Ways to Make a Living.'" "And yet you are begging!" "Yes, sir; that's one of the ways."—Houston Post.

THE WAYFARER

Reading of Odd Books

THE COMPLACENT sense of superiority with which the faddist views the normal person fills the breast of the Wayfarer as he hears friends discuss the latest popular book. For this skeptical observer is cynical enough to believe that a moving consideration in this general devotion to the book of the hour is merely a search for a new topic for talk. To be able to say that one has read the latest vogue in fiction—and thus to prove one's self up to date in literature!—is, alas, one reason why the circulation of the "best sellers" mounts up. Now the Wayfarer believes that it would be shrewder tactics for the person who would shine as a conversationist to read the books which other folks are not reading. Thus would be served the same purpose as is sought by the woman who wears a rare jewel or an original design in dress. Distinctiveness is always interesting.

* * * * *

Whether the foregoing paragraph sets forth his motive or not, it is true that the Wayfarer likes to read old books and then, next in order, unusual books. Any story that is worth reading once is worth reading half a dozen times. A real friendship with a comparatively small number of characters in literature is worth a nodding acquaintance with a multitude of the once met, soon forgotten figures of the day's ephemeral fiction.

* * * * *

The unusual book, or, better, the unusual topic, is to be commended to the wise. What a boon to a dinner table is the person who has studied Arabia, and who knows proverbs and incidents from that mysterious land which has kept its own unchanged life and wild self-sovereignty for millenniums. The oldest persisting civilization on earth, if it may be called a civilization, is that of Arabia. Its light illuminates a score of subjects of common interest, from the dates or spices on the table to the latest expedition in archæology or the Turko-Balkan war. Everybody knows the shepherd's "rod" of the twenty-third psalm; but who can tell its relation to the peculiar headdress of the Arabs? Is Arabia all a sandy waste, or are there cities and nations hidden in its mysterious interior? What is a "blood covenant" and how long does the law of salt remain binding? Whence come the Arab steeds; and how did the strong tincture of Judaism and Christianity get into Islam?

* * * * *

The camel driver of Mecca is himself a portentous figure on the day's horizon; who, what and when was Mohammed; and where and what is Mecca? The ramifications of Arabia are almost endless; and, to the Wayfarer, of absorbing interest. Lost in them, he finds surcease from the cares of tyrannous today; for the immemorial desert, while it has its mirages, does give its friends perspective. Out of the desert came some of the great servants of God and leaders of men.

* * * * *

As to the books, the Wayfarer likes best Zwemer's "Arabia, the Cradle of Islam." The young author's viewpoint is modern and congenial, and he writes with scholarly carefulness and literary skill. Doughty's "Arabia Deserta" comes next in order of worth; and then Hogarth's "Penetration of Arabia," which is more informing than entertaining. The latter quality is uppermost in Bayard Taylor's "Travels in Arabia." Captain Burton's adventures are vivid, and the daring, dauntless man himself is a figure of compelling interest. Other books throw light on Arabia from the archæological side, and still others, like Washington Irving's "Mohammed and his Successors" from the religious side.

* * * * *

One advantage of reading in a big subject is the frequent recurrence of unexpected relationships. Thus, Dr. Franklin E. Hoskins's new volume, "From the Nile to Nebo," with its beautiful pictures, vivid descriptions, readable personal experiences and scholarly contribution to questions concerning the Exodus, links up the desert to the Holy Land, and makes the wanderings of the children of Israel a reality; so that one can no longer say with the old lady, "Well, now, I knew those places were in the Bible, but I never thought of them being on earth."

* * * * *

By way of Arabia, too, a conservationist may go into the absorbing theme of the restoration of Mesopotamia; and that path leads straight back to the glories of Babylonia, Assyria, Persia and Macedonia. It does appear as if any one big subject, faithfully followed, would lead a student into the entire field of knowledge. Certainly no person can remain narrow or small-visioned who reads greatly upon any great theme. And, what is possibly more to the point, his reading will possess far more real interest than the desultory consumption of the latest popular novels.

* * * * *

When he set forth upon this particular ramble, the Wayfarer had no thought of writing a disquisition upon Arabia. His aim was to suggest the varied charm and profit of unconventional reading, within a field of magnitude. He might, with equal aptness, have chosen the alluring theme of Tibet, with its yaks and yogis, its swastikas and its prayer wheels, its musk oxen and its monks, its turquoises and its traditions, its grand lama and its grander mountains; its mysteries, which are no longer mysterious, and its possible place as an American influenced nation of the future.

* * * * *

To pass from geographical topics to one more abstract, the Wayfarer commends a course of reading in the woman question, as it has existed since the dawn of history and in all lands. From the New England woman without a husband to the Tibetan woman with several; from the veiled lady of the Moslem harem to the cooly women of the Japanese rice fields; from the child wives of India to the tyrannous old women of China, and then in a thousand other directions, this theme runs entertainingly. If the subject be too big, confine it to the detail of woman's adornments, from the tattoo marks of the Bedouin belle, or the nose rings and anklets of the Zulu maiden, or the hatchet and vitriol bottle of the London suffragist, to the sartorial mysteries of our own American maidens. Here the water is getting deep, and the Wayfarer makes for the safer sands of Arabia.

THE HOME COUNCIL

How Mary Found Her Niche

By Hilda Richmond

"SOUNDS like an invitation to a wedding dinner," remarked the new boarder from the village of Glenwood. "How about it, Miss Mary?"

"I thought I mentioned that it was to be a housewarming," explained Mary Frame, in her gentle, refined way. "I want you all to come to an old-fashioned midday dinner next Tuesday."

It had required real heroism for Mary Frame to include the new boarder in the invitation, but she felt that she must do it, even though it spoiled the day. The new boarder was a relative of Mrs. Stone's, and the other boarders were certain that under no other circumstances could he have obtained entrance into her refined little home for seven young workers and herself.

"I've heard that in villages everybody knew everybody else's business," remarked Miss Alton severely, after the door had closed behind the breezy new boarder, "but I never dreamed that it was literally true. This Mr. Stanley certainly is the most curious, prying piece of humanity I ever saw."

Just then John Stanley reentered the room, so no one could reply. "How many jobs has that Mary Frame had since she boarded here?" he inquired carelessly. "She's going to be fired soon and somebody ought to warn her in time so she can resign. It's a bad thing for a girl to get a reputation for being fired. She seems to be a sort of round peg in a square hole. Nice girl, but not cut out for a stenographer. The boss fairly tore his hair today when she sent an important letter to the wrong address and he had to telegraph for it."

The boarders heard the news with dismay. "That girl ought to find out what she's fitted for and get into some other kind of work," John went on. "It's a wonder to me that you folks haven't helped her into her right place in all the time you've been together. Jay Ellis told me yesterday that you had boarded with Aunt Fanny for five years. There's something she can do, for she's a sweet, bright girl, and she ought to find out what it is. She'll never succeed as a stenographer."

Mary Frame grew more and more provoked with the new boarder as the days flew by. He wanted to know all about her plan to keep house with her cousin, who was coming in from a little town to study music, and he particularly wanted to know the cost of the venture. Without a bit of hesitation and in the most friendly manner he inquired prices and plans and purposes, and when Mrs. Stone was taken on a tour of inspection of the tiny flat he insisted on going too, and betrayed the liveliest interest in the new establishment.

It had taken Mary only a short time to rent and arrange a tiny flat for her cousin and herself, and there they were to live together with an elderly aunt. Mary was perfectly happy, for she had had no home for five years. John Stanley watched her as she went about touching the pretty feminine belongings her hands had fashioned, or which she had picked up in the stores at bargain prices, and for once he forgot to ask questions.

"Here's the fruit cake and the preserves and some of the things for the dinner," said Mary, opening the door of the brand new cupboard. "I can scarcely wait until Aunt Edith and Cecelia get here. They won't come until Wednesday, but I can have my dinner just the same on Tuesday."

"What rent do you have to pay?" broke in Mr. Stanley.

"Twenty-five dollars a month," said Mary rather faintly. It was impossible not to give out the information the new boarder craved, but she did wish he would not pry into every detail of her little scheme.

The new home was dainty enough for a bride, though its furnishings were cheap and certainly not overabundant. It was because Mary had made the most of them and had added many little touches possible only to a real homemaker that the small rooms were so charming. The pretty curtains at the windows, the vase of flowers on the sitting room table, the shelf of blossoming plants and all the homemade conceits possible only to a girl thoroughly domestic in her tastes made of the little apartment a home in its best sense, and Mrs. Stone predicted that the housewarming dinner would be the beginning of happy days. Cecelia Frame had not seen the place, but she sent her part of the money and trusted everything to Mary. She was wrapped up in music, as she said, and hated fancy work and cooking.

"How foolish to allow a little thing like the presence of John Stanley to disturb me!" said Mary, as she climbed the stairs Monday morning to take a last look at the dainty apartment. "After tomorrow I won't see him except at the office, and there he attends strictly to business. I do hope everything will turn out right tomorrow. This dining room is rather a tight squeeze for nine, but I can manage it."

That night John Stanley walked home from the office with her. "Miss Mary," he said, "I don't believe I can come tomorrow. Uncle David is coming to see me in the morning and he'll be here until late in the afternoon."

"Bring him with you," suggested Mary, but in her heart she hoped he would not.

"That's a suggestion!" said John heartily. "Thank you very much! I didn't want to miss the dinner, but I couldn't neglect Uncle David."

The vexation over the approaching guest and the necessity of rearranging her table were as nothing to Mary, however, when she reached her room and found that her pay envelope contained a brief note telling her that her services were no longer needed. Sick at heart, she sat down on the bed and began to examine herself to see why she had so often failed. Finally she settled it that her anxiety for her new home and the time she had spent in arranging it had caused her to neglect her work, and she burst into self-reproachful tears.

"But I don't know what I could have done in my leisure hours to help my office work, after all," was her final conclusion, as she grew more calm. She was all unconscious of her errors in spelling and punctuation, and her more serious blunders. "Well, I suppose I'll have to hunt another place. There's one consolation—it won't cost me so much to live while I'm getting a new place, and afterwards."

The next day, when the dinner was sending forth appetizing odors, and Mary in a frilled white apron was vibrating between kitchen and front window to see if her guests were in sight, a messenger boy came with a special delivery letter that turned the poor little hostess faint and sick. In a very few sentences Cecelia Frame rather incoherently informed her that she was going to be married, and the plan for coming to town to study music was all set aside. "Sell the furniture for what you can get," she wrote, "and send me my part of the money as soon as possible. Aunt Edith says she is glad she doesn't have to leave home, as she never did like the city. Perhaps you can find some other girl willing to go into partnership with you, and you can still keep house. I hope you will not be too much disappointed."

With the guests at the door there was nothing to do but hide the letter and make the best of the day. Mary hastily drew down the shades and slightly darkened the cheery little rooms, and when the last guest had arrived hurried to the kitchen to dish up the dinner. Even stout Uncle David Stanley could not add to her cup of misery now.

In spite of her woe the dinner was a complete success. Mary forgot that the little home would have to be broken up, that she was without a place to work, that her dreams would soon fade and that she was a failure as a stenographer. How could she help forgetting when everyone praised the house, the dinner and the dainty decorations arranged in honor of the housewarming?

"And John tells me it didn't cost a fortune," remarked stout Mr. Stanley, as they lingered at the table. "He says you picked up the furniture here and there and made lots of the things yourself."

"Yes, I did," said Mary, without the slightest annoyance. "I am very proud of my work."

"You have a right to be, my child," said the old gentleman. "How would you like to give up your place in the office and take one with our firm? We sell furniture and we'd like to hire a competent young person to help young folks select their furniture and to arrange model flats and sample rooms for the inexperienced. The salary will be more than you're getting—John told me how much you receive at the office—and you can begin at once. This place isn't far from our store—that is, our branch store—and if you don't object to showing it off, you can keep it as it is and we'll allow you a larger salary. Folks like to see the actual thing, not a flat arranged in a store."

"I would be delighted!" gasped Mary. "Th—thank you ever so much!"

"You needn't thank me; thank John. He suggested the plan to me. We've been looking for a helper for some time, but most girls like to sit in offices nowadays. John arranged this meeting today so I could see how well you arranged your flat on a little money. I've

Verses Old and New

A NET TO SNARE THE MOONLIGHT

The dew, the rain and moonlight
All prove our Father's mind.
The dew, the rain and moonlight
Come down to bless mankind.

Come let us see that all men
Have land to catch the rain,
Have grass to snare the spheres of dew,
And fields spread for the grain.

Yea, we would give to each poor man
Ripe wheat, and poppies red,
A peaceful place at evening,
With the stars just overhead:

A net to snare the moonlight,
A sod spread to the sun,
A place of toil by daytime,
Of dreams when toil is done.

—Nicholas Vachel Lindsay in The American Magazine.

Mother, Not the Horse, Unmanageable

An old lady from the country and her small son were driving to town one day, when a huge motor car bore down upon them. The horse began to prance and the old lady jumped out of the buggy, screaming at the top of her voice. The chauffeur stopped and offered to help.

"That's all right," said the boy, composedly. "I can manage the horse. You just lead mother past."

YOUNG AMERICA

Betty and Benjy's Christmas Work

(Unfinished-Story Contest)

BETTY sat by the window in her little rocking chair, her forehead puckered into a frown, and in her hand a stocking with a very large hole in the heel.

"Oh, dear!" she sighed. "I do wish Benjy wouldn't make such big holes. I just b'lieve he does it on purpose. Why don't you teach him to mend, too, mamma, so he can see how nice it is?"

Mrs. Bradford laughed as she leaned over and drew out of the little blue mending bag at Betty's feet a stocking marked at the top with a tiny strip of tape on which was stitched "Betty" in red letters.

"I don't believe Benjy can beat this," she said, pointing to a jagged hole in the toe. "Busy feet can't help making holes, Betty. You and Benjy have run errands for me, and worked in the garden, and done many helpful things I can think of since school closed. Holes made in that way can't be such very bad holes, can they? Wouldn't you rather have busy feet and holes than lazy feet and no holes?"

Betty's gaze had wandered wistfully out to the hammock swinging idly under the trees as her mother talked. Then it came back and fell doubtfully on to the stocking bag.

"I—suppose—p'raps——" she began hesitatingly, feeling that she ought to say "Yes," like a good little girl, but that she must be strictly truthful, too. "Only, I do wish——"

Bang! went the screen door, and in rushed Benjy, hot and breathless. "I say!" he cried.

"Gentlemen don't slam doors," interrupted Betty primly. Betty was feeling very virtuous because of the mending. "You'll waken Baby Margery. She's taking her nap."

"Ladies don't interrupt," retorted Benjy good-naturedly. "Say, you'd never guess what!"

Benjy looked so important and so mysterious that Betty at once dropped her airs. "What?" she asked eagerly.

"You know that snapshot I took of little Nannie Williams? Well, I just took the picture over to Mrs. Williams, and she says she likes 'em so much she'll pay me a dollar if I'll make a dozen for her. How's that?"

"Earn a whole dollar!" cried Betty. "How grand! What are you going to do with the money?"

"Well," replied Benjy importantly, running his hands deep into his trousers pockets and jingling the three pennies that were all he had left out of his week's allowance, "I'll have to buy some printing paper with part of it, and I guess I'll buy a baseball with the rest—a good one."

Betty's face fell and her mouth went down at the corners. "Stingy!" she said. "Aren't you going to give me any of it, or Baby Margery, either?"

Before Benjy could answer Mrs. Bradford came to his rescue.

"Benjy didn't mean to be stingy, Betty. He just didn't remember to be generous, that's all. But I've remembered for him. I've thought of a fine way for him to use that dollar!"

"How?" cried the twins in concert.

"Christmas," replied their mother briefly.

"How for Christmas?" the twins insisted.

"You may not like it when you know," Mrs. Bradford teased. "Sure you want to know?"

"Sure!" the twins assured her.

"Well, then," she went on, "this 'how' is something I've been thinking about for a long time. Benjy's dollar is just a part of it. And the apple bank's a part, and the other part is—you, dears."

Betty and Benjy looked blank. "Do you mean for me to save the dollar?" Benjy finally asked.

"Where do I come in?" demanded Betty.

Mrs. Bradford clapped her hands over her ears. "How can I talk if you talk?" she cried. So Betty and Benjy promised to be good, and leaned back in their chairs to listen.

"How would you like to earn money to buy Christmas presents with this year, instead of asking papa and mamma for it? You have nearly all vacation to do it in, besides after school and Saturdays in the fall."

Betty didn't seem very happy at the thought. The mending frown came back. "I don't see what I can do to make money," she protested. "Benjy's a boy. It's different with him."

"Huh! You can do just as many things to earn money as I can, Bet," said Benjy. "Maybe we can do some things together. I think it's a fine plan. It'll seem lots more as if we really gave the presents if we earn the money ourselves."

"Baby Margery, too? Must she earn money?" asked Betty, brightening a bit. "She can't work!"

"Yes, Baby Margery, too. There are plenty of things she can do to earn pennies. You'll see. Now, are you quite sure you want to try it?"

"Quite, quite sure," promised the twins.

"Then I'll get two more apple banks, so you can each have one, and can keep your earnings separate. And you shall each have a little book to keep your accounts in so you will know just how much you have earned, and how you earned it. Betty's book shall have a blue cover and Benjy's a red. I will keep Baby Margery's accounts for her. And then a week before Christmas we'll empty the banks and go shopping! Won't it be fun?"

"Hurrah!" cried Benjy.

"Hurrah!" echoed Betty. "Let's call ourselves the Busyfeet Club!"

And the Busyfeet Club they became.

HOW DID THEY EARN MONEY?

$3 Each to the Girl and Boy Who Will Tell.

DEAR YOUNG AMERICA: Just put yourselves in Betty and Benjy and Baby Margery's place and think what they could do to earn money for Christmas. Then tell us about it, using not more than 400 words, fewer if possible. Don't say, "I think Benjy could do this," or "Perhaps Betty did thus and so." No, that won't do at all. The editor wants a real story of how the children earned their money.

Prizes will be given as follows: Two first prizes of $3 each to the girl and boy whose stories are the best; one second prize of $2 and three $1 prizes. All stories must be at the Young America headquarters of The Continent by Sept. 1.

Girls and boys 14 and under may compete. You know the conditions—stories must be written in ink, or typewritten, on one side of the paper only, and signed with your full name, age and address.

If you happen to have any photos that would illustrate your story, the editor will be glad to have them.

Now, Young America, you have just lots of time for writing, these vacation days, and the editor is looking forward to receiving some unusually nice stories. You won't disappoint her, will you?

P. S.—This has nothing to do with the vacation stories. It is a contest by itself. Why not write for both contests?

A Game for a Rainy Day

This game is really the same as simple acrostics, only instead of using ordinary words, names of people and places are chosen from the Bible. For instance, we will suppose that Abraham is the word chosen. The players are all provided with pieces of paper and pencils, and are requested to write the letters forming Abraham on one side of the paper, thus:

M

The leader of the game then gives the time limit in which the players have to find a Bible name beginning with each of the letters forming Abraham's name, thus:

Ananias
Benjamin
Rebekah
Adam
Hezekiah
Absalom
Mary.

Another way of playing this game is to provide players with Bibles, and after the name has been written tell them to search their Bibles to find a short text beginning with each letter.

Why They Can Do It

The teacher was giving a lesson in mathematics and English combined.

"A fathom," she said, "is a nautical word used in defining distance. It means six feet. Now I want some little girl to give me a sentence using the word fathom."

Instantly a hand shot up in the rear of the room.

"Well, Mary, you may give your sentence."

Mary stood up proudly.

"The reason flies can walk on the ceiling," said she, "is because they have a fathom."

The Sensitive Sun

By Elizabeth Knobel

Some mornings when the Sun comes up he's very bright and gay,
And beams around upon us in a very jolly way.
Perhaps it's 'cause the night before in China land he found
The children were the very best the whole wide world around.

Some mornings when the Sun comes up he's very pale and sad,
And all the day is dull because the sunshine isn't glad.
Perhaps it's 'cause the night before in China, far away,
The children were so naughty that he's sober all the day.

So mornings, when the Sun comes up, I'm very, very good;
I try to be polite and kind, and do the things I should.
For oh, it would be dreadful if the dear old Sun should be Too sad to shine in China land, just all because of me!

MISSIONARY WORK

A Mysterious Visitor and His Message

Pak Changno of Poong Chun, Korea, is one of the stalwart Christians of his neighborhood, and his story of his conversion is more than usually interesting: Pak, eighteen years ago, was a soothsayer, whose revenue came chiefly through his supposed ability to designate proper sites for the graves of the dead. Though he went about widely in pursuit of his trade, he kept his home in a retired village, where he seldom had any visitors except those who came on business. One night, as he studied in his hut, he became drowsy, but was suddenly aroused after a time by the tapping of a cane outside the door. An old, infirm man came in presently and told Pak of a certain man (designating the man by name) in a near-by village, whom the stranger commanded Pak to visit on a very important errand.

On awaking the next morning the soothsayer was totally unable to tell whether he had had a real visitor in the person of the infirm stranger or whether the whole incident was a dream. But in any case, he remembered the name given him and decided to start out to the near-by village and inquire whether such a person lived there. As soon as he had asked within the limits of the town the name was promptly recognized, and he was directed where to find the man. Going to the house designated, Pak was warmly received and his host began immediately to speak about Jesus. The scothsayer bought a New Testament and Christian tracts, and returned home to read them, with his family gathered about him. Soon all of them were Christian, and Pak especially has been actively engaged in church work ever since. Yet to this day he cannot say whether he had a dream or whether a flesh and blood visitor brought God's message on that memorable night.

New Boom Town in an Ancient Land

They have "boom" towns in ancient India also, very like the mushroom communities which grow up in the western American states. Such a place is Moga, where Rev. R. H. Carter is now located in charge of an important mission station. Seven years ago, when Mr. Carter, then new to India, first visited the place, immediately after the completion of the Ferozepore and Ludhiana railroad, he walked from the station three-quarters of a mile to the first mud house where he could find lodging. Now the country road along which he then walked is lined the whole distance with brick store buildings, where twenty-feet frontage rents for $4,000 a year. With money appropriated from the Kennedy bequest, thirteen acres of land for a mission compound has been purchased in Moga, and the work—which already includes no less than 1,200 Christians in Moga itself and 100 villages surrounding—is deemed certain to expand rapidly. The foundations of this work were laid by the late Rev. J. N. Hyde, who came hither from Ludhiana, and after his death Mr. Carter was placed in charge.

The Biting Irony of Count Okuma

An interesting and significant view of the way the California agitation against the Japanese looks to a patriotic American missionary at work in Japan may be taken out of the subjoined extract from a recent letter written by Dr. John L. Dering, a Baptist missionary long resident in Yokohama. If the reader is interested in nothing else from the quotation, he cannot fail to note with a certain degree of relish the pungent irony in which Count Okuma indulged in his speech before the Yokohama peace meeting.

"We are in the midst of a very serious situation here in Japan, and when one reads the dispatches and gathers what is possible regarding the situation at home, he is tempted to become very anxious. We have been most fortunate in having a considerable number of wise visitors within the past few months, and it would seem that they ought to be a very great help at the present juncture. I place large confidence in what may be said and done by such men as Mr. Hamilton Holt, Dr. Mabie, John R. Mott, Dr. Henderson and many others who have recently been in Japan.

"You may be interested to know that at a great peace meeting in Yokohama yesterday, attended by 400 or more of the leading citizens, Count Okuma is said to have made one of the ablest addresses that he has given for a long time. He was applauded to the echo, as he expressed the following sentiments:

" 'We must have great patience with the people of the United States, and we must give them credit for being sincere and honest, just as we wish such credit given to us; we must not forget that in the pre-Meiji period our warriors and statesmen were very averse to the opening of Japan to foreigners; some even thought sincerely that it was for the best interests of Japan to cut off the heads of foreigners and to prevent all relationship with them. The advance of the Meiji period and acquaintanceship with foreigners has brought us to realize what a mistake was then made, and we can well understand how many of the people of the United States, with little or no knowledge of the Japanese, should feel as our people did years ago; but we may also believe that when they come to get their eyes open and understand our people, there will be as great a change in the United States as there has been in Japan.' "

Work of the Girls' School at Bangkok

Miss Lucy Starling of Maung Nan, Laos, after an eight-day trip down the river to Bangkok to get one of Miss Edna Cole's seniors in the Harriet M. House School to help her teach in Nan Girls' School, wrote after their ten days' journey up river: "The few days in Wang Lang School were an inspiration. This school, up-to-date in every way, is also building deep. Already has Nan Girls' School responded to the stimulus of a well educated Christian Siamese woman; and our people of the north owe Wang Lang a large debt that it is thus ministering to our need for well equipped teachers. Me Pa, our new teacher, is a daughter of the late Kroo Na, a translator of "Pilgrim's Progress" into Siamese. She refused two good positions in Bangkok to come to Nan—one because she would have to observe Buddhism if she accepted. Companion to young women of high rank, she has taken the place of sister to our poor village girls and is helping to make refined Christian women of them. Such characteristics are not the product of the Orient; and when they are found one may be sure that they have been nourished by the tears and prayers, perhaps the very life blood of one who is living near the Master.

African School Boys Help Missionaries

Rev. George Schwab, writing from Metet, West Africa, says that on a recent itinerating trip he found twenty-two boys of the mission school who had volunteered to do evangelistic work during the vacation, going from place to place, taking neither money nor price, but trusting in God to provide for their needs. They had been sent out two and two, after the fashion of the seventy, to eleven districts. But Mr. Schwab adds that he almost regretted their having gone, for their return has brought more prayers that must be unheeded: "When are you going to send someone to take away our shame?" "Father, when are you going to tell us the things of God?" "Where is the man of God you must send us?" "Build a town for us! We must have someone for us to show us the way!" "Just two words, and then go on!" And always the answer has to go back, "None to send! None to send!"

The help afforded by these schoolboys is a factor in the work. Another missionary who has recently returned from Africa says that it is surprising and pathetic to see the respect and attention the older and influential men pay to these boys who are able to read the Word to them and explain the gospel. She says: "One little fellow at Alim imitates Mr. Evans, even to the way he raises his hands when pronouncing the benediction."

Practical Christianity in Korea

The spring meeting of the women's Bible class in Taiku, Korea, this year was attended to the very end by nearly all of the 540 women enrolled. The poor, tired, dirty women, many of whom had tramped from fifty to a hundred miles, carrying on their backs rice for their food on the journey and during the ten days of study, and some of them carrying babies as well—these weary folk were, upon arrival, ushered into a little room in the church, where a waiting woman washed their dusty feet and anointed the sores caused by the long tramp. In the bathroom of the dormitory of the girls' school on the hill 200 or 300 of the women were given a tub bath in warm water, an undreamed of luxury to most of Korea's poor people.

New Doors of Entrance Into Guatemala

The workers of the Presbyterian mission in Guatemala regard it as a great satisfaction that they have been able to secure the full time service of a strong, intelligent and spiritual young Indian to preach among his people. The missionaries in Guatemala learn Spanish and preach and teach in that language. But a very great proportion of the 60,000 Indians in the near neighborhood of Quezaltenango know nothing of Spanish and cannot be reached in that tongue. The Indian who takes on this work will have a field of labor twice as large, measured by numerical calculation, as Mr. Sullenberger, who preaches in Spanish, can possibly reach.

Mr. Sullenberger is himself particularly encouraged and rejoiced over the situation in the village of Salcaja, where the nine adult members of one family have professed conversion. Their village is unusually fanatical in its Romanism, even for a Guatemalan town, and this family has already endured very stringent persecutions. But all of its members regard themselves now in the light of missionaries to the village, and feel bound to remain there and witness for an evangelical gospel. The men are already having a very notable effect on their neighbors.

In the city of Guatemala the new girls' boarding school is at the point of completion. It will accommodate 100 pupils and will give to the Protestant church a prestige in the city which it has never enjoyed before.

A Test for a Suitor in India

Writing of a winter's itineration among forty-three villages in the Rupar district, Mrs. U. S. G. Jones of India says: "A Christian widow whom we tried to get a husband for we found hard to suit. Just before going into the room where a would-be suitor was waiting she whispered to me, 'Please get him to pray'—with the result that she could not have him. And he certainly did not show up well, but then the circumstances were trying! I have never heard a village woman pray the way this woman can."

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was led by Mrs. James M. Wilson of Wilmette. An encouraging report was given by the treasurer of Chicago Presbyterial Society and also by the treasurer of the board, who, comparing the receipts of the past two years, said, "We have looked upon Chicago Presbyterial Society as just about ideal, although Detroit Presbyterial Society made the largest increase of any." Mrs. S. C. Peoples of Siam found the news of L. H. Severance's death hard to believe, having seen him apparently in good health only a few days before in New York, when after the final vote which settled the question of a station among the Laos in China he said to her husband, "You've beaten me, but God bless you." With a reminder that Mr. Severance started in Wooster, Ohio, the first Presbyterian training school, Mrs. Pratt said, "Let us pray for another like him."

—During the past year, as reported by the Presbyterian department of missionary education, there have been enrolled 2,076 foreign mission study classes, a gain of 497 over the previous year. Including home mission classes, the total number was 2,975, with 47,230 members, more or less intensively studying missions. These figures do not entirely represent the work done, as many classes, doubtless, were never reported or enrolled on the enrollment cards. Of the number of classes mentioned, 2,364 were held in societies under the auspices of the women's boards. In the territory of the Board of the Northwest reports were received from 470 classes, exclusive of those in the Westminster Guild.

July 20, 1913—Moses Called to Deliver Israel

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 3:1—4:20. Golden Text, Matthew 5:8: Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.

The life of Moses divides itself naturally into three chapters of forty years each. They are easily remembered—Egypt, Midian and the desert, or the courtier, the shepherd and the lawgiver. This is the second period.

Moses has now attained the age of 80 years. With us that is the sunset of life. Few men live beyond it and fewer still at that age do their greatest work. But genius is always the exception. God makes an occasional Moses to guide those below him. Moses and Paul were essental to the dispensations, the one to the old and the other to the new, and their work still follows them.

Moses, while he was in Midian, was a shepherd. The Midianites were a roving people who lived in tents. They believed in the one God and claimed Abraham as an ancestor. Their property consisted largely of flocks, of which Reuel, the father-in-law of Moses, no doubt had many. These had been intrusted to Moses and their care formed the chief interest of his life. We become naturally a part of our surroundings, and however Moses may have regarded the situation at the beginning, he would finally learn to accept it as coming from God.

Moses but an Instrument in the Hands of Providence

Those saints of old associated the will of God with all that came. For them there was a direct cause for every effect. Moses was in Midian because God had sent him there. His way was directed by one overruling purpose. The slaying of the Egyptian was only incidental to it. How far God may have revealed Moses' future we do not know. There is no evidence of any signboard pointing ahead. Unlike Joseph, no sheaves bowed to his sheaf; no star became the center of the sun and moon in his sky. He was an exile from Egypt and had ample reason to regret his part. His preference for his own people was honorable, but no visible good had come because of it. The oppression was just as severe and the expectation of a deliverer gave no promise of being fulfilled.

It is seldom that an immediate harvest follows our most hopeful sowing. Forty years is a long time to wait and most men would have become discouraged. Possibly Moses did. We sometimes write our feelings into the names we bestow. The name of Moses' first-born, Gershom, indicating that he had been a "sojourner in a foreign land," may be taken as a suggestion of how he felt. His surroundings were utterly unlike the splendor of his court life in Egypt. But the die had been cast and he must bear the result. It looked like a mistake, but he had acted for the best, so why complain?

But the tide presently turned. Moses no longer sang to the minor note of Gershom. The recognition of God's presence had entered his soul and driven away whatever despair he may have felt.

Kingdom of Egypt Raised to High Plane by Pharaoh

In the meantime affairs in Egypt had been prospering. Unless history is misleading, the Pharaoh from whom Moses had fled had by conquest and diplomacy raised the kingdom to a plane never reached before. Cities had been built, canals dug and great walls erected against the invasion of foreign armies. But death laid its hand upon him and his scepter passed over to his son. The second Pharaoh was unrelenting in his policy toward the Israelites and their sufferings cried mightily unto God.

When the time of deliverance comes the deliverer comes with it. The deliverer in this instance was a plain shepherd in Midian, far removed from the scene of wrong. One day as he was leading his flock back from the coast to the mountain an acacia tree on fire attracted his attention. The sight was a familiar one, but in this instance the tree was not consumed. Curiosity is the pioneer of knowledge, and Moses turned aside to see why the bush was not burned. A voice from within warned him against presumption. "Moses, Moses . . . Draw not hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." The removal of the shoe was a mark of reverence and is still so regarded in the East. Reverence is essential to worship. Curiosity may wear its shoes with impunity, but worship must lay them aside.

The unusual is sometimes essential in order to suggest the presence of God. That accomplished, it ceases to be. The voice within the fire is heard only by the reverent and the true. Many, however, see the fire and nothing else. They wear their shoes in the very presence of the Eternal. This effort to popularize spiritual things is to be regretted.

God first declares himself. He is the God of the patriarchs—Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Moses realized the awful presence and veiled his face. God's mission was soon told. He had seen the oppression of his people and had come to effect their deliverance. But man must share in the work. Moses was overwhelmed with a sense of his own insignificance and exclaimed: "Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh?" God promised no additional strength. Moses should go as he was, but he would go along. This is God's constant method. Our way may be hedged about on every side, but God goes with us.

No Terrors in Egypt for Him Who Walks with God

Moses again protested that when he should appear to the people with the message that the God of their fathers had sent him they would demand to know the name of that God. "And God said unto Moses . . . Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." Names signify epochs in the history of Israel. "I AM," or Jehovah, implied the self-existence of the deity. The Jews came to regard it with superstition. They refused to speak it. Tradition says that it was spoken but once a year, and then by the high priest when he entered the holy of holies. Why this name carried above all others a conviction to the people cannot be determined. Perhaps Moses himself did not know, but he had received it from God and that was sufficient. Obedience is the highest form of service. The acacia tree of duty is always on fire. It burns with a ceaseless flame, and as we approach it so will God speak from within. God is ever ready to receive his own. Learn to listen and learn to act. There are no terrors in Egypt for him who takes God along.

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—The bush that burns but never disappears stands for the church of God, which is often subjected to the flame but never destroyed. While we investigate sacred mysteries we must approach them with reverence. God is interested in slaves as much as in kings. God moves toward purposes of redemption along his own chosen lines.

The burning bush which "was not consumed" is the accepted symbol of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and its motto, taken from verse 2, is "Nevertheless, it was not consumed." Of very recent times we have had an illustration of something very like this phenomenon in radium, which gives out light and yet suffers, so far as man can discover, no diminution of substance.

The bush fitly represents the reformed churches of Great Britain and the continent; for everywhere they were tried "so as by fire," yet were nowhere utterly destroyed. We are learning much of the possibilities of matter which our fathers never knew; and the natural and the supernatural draw close together, yet need not be confused.

God Reveals Himself to the Godly, Giving Grace for Grace

Verse 1—The flock of Jethro was possibly as large as some of the flocks of sheep which belong to our Montana and California sheepmen. When they had cropped all the pastures on the west or seaward side of the mountains Moses moved the living mass to the other side of the range, where he was much more alone. He may have had his subordinates and undershepherds, but in the distant and little known valleys which he now sought he knew the visions of "that inward eye which is the bliss of solitude."

Verse 2—Moses recognized the strange phenomenon of the bush as a sign from God which demanded his investigation. The acacia, not unlike our thorny locust, sometimes assumes the dimensions of a small tree. Nevertheless, our revisers have retained the word "bush," as the majority of such acacias growing in the wilderness are stunted in stature and insignificant in appearance. It was not the bush that was noteworthy but the fire; not the fire but the survival of the bush from the fire. Even while the wonder is unexplained it is in a line with most of the miracles recorded in the Bible. God makes himself known by redemption and preservation rather than by destruction. He does not shorten the day but prolongs it (Jos. 10:12-13). Moses easily recognized the grace in a sign which, instead of sweeping the peninsula with flame, caused an easily consumed bush to withstand the flame.

Verse 3—Moses was a student as well as a prophet. How many there are who never ask themselves the reason of anything! How many regard the stars with complete indifference and the processes and resources of nature with uninterested souls! Moses was not of such a makeup; he was quick to ask the reason of things and so came to be the great leader that he was.

Verses 4-5—It is evident that Moses approached the wonderful sight with awe, for while God commands a further mark of worship and submission to the divine will, no word is spoken which can be construed as a reproach.

It has been from time immemorial the custom of the East to take off the loose shoe as we take off the hat. This custom has a significance easily understood because the shoes collect offensive matter which the hat does not. To this day the mosque is entered only by shoeless feet. God would have Moses understand also that it is the divine presence which consecrates a spot, not man's act or ritual dedication. An open and bare spot on the mountainside may be made holy by God's presence, and the most gorgeous temple be fit only for stabling herds (Matt. 23:28).

Verse 6—But that Moses might not be overwhelmed by the situation God declared that he who spake was he who had brought Abraham from Ur (Gen. 12:1), protected Isaac from the warlike tribes surrounding him (Gen. 26:17-24) and brought Jacob back to the land of his fathers in peace (Gen. 33:18-20). The instinctive act of Moses in veiling his face shows how deep an impression this vision and these words made upon the man now called to a great act of self-sacrifice and courage.

God Reveals Interest in and Care for the Oppressed

Verse 7—Doubtless the question had often come up to the mind of Moses, "Doth God know?" (Ps. 73:11). Possibly he had often thought that the deplorable condition of the chosen people was more to him than it was to the God of their fathers. But what would our revolution have amounted to if instituted before the birth of George Washington? What would have resulted from any efforts to ameliorate the condition of American slaves before Abraham Lincoln had attracted the attention of the republic to himself? The hour has never come until the man has come.

Verse 8—The intention of the Almighty as to the future home of the Israelites is made known. They were to be returned to their own home. It was a land that produced in abundance the two luxuries of the age, "milk" for which natural pastures must be found, and "honey" for which wide expanses of flowery meadows were imperative. Egypt had neither of these. A country that did possess them was regarded as blessed above all others.

Verse 10—God creates the possibility and opens the door of opportunity, but man must develop the fact. We must be willing to lead the movement for which we have prayed.

Verse 11—The one question is not "Who am I?" but "Who is God?"

Verse 14—And finally, God makes himself known by that most august of all titles, "I AM THAT I AM"—the Life of all life, the Source of all power, the Fount of all truth.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Topic—The fig tree and all the trees. Luke 21:29-33.

Luke writes for gentile readers, scattered through all parts of the world, some of whom may not be familiar with the habits of the fig tree. Therefore he adds to the text of the other gospels "and all the trees." This principle holds good everywhere. When the fig tree, or any tree, puts forth its leaves, you know that the summer is near. You do not need any one to tell you so; you know it of yourselves.

In like manner when you see all these signs described by Jesus in the discourse contained in chapter 21, you know their inevitable significance, if only your moral sense has not been dulled by sin.

The highest love does not blind us; it gives us rather a double sight. The intensity of the Master's affection for Jerusalem revealed unmistakably the necessary outcome of her rejection of himself. He came to bring light to them and they preferred darkness, because they did not want to be shamed by the acknowledgment of their evil deeds. He came to bring life to them, and they chose death, because the way of life demanded an initial sacrifice of their pride and self-righteousness. This wrongness of head and heart would continue to grow. It would inevitably bring them into conflict with the Roman power. It would cause rebellion and civil war; famine and pestilence; persecutions and family quarrels; the siege of Jerusalem and her ravishment; captivity and death. Only in the steadfastness of their faith would the disciples of the Master be saved. But Jerusalem would be trodden down until "the times of the gentiles be fulfilled."

"The times of the gentiles" would not last forever. They, too, were impious, and would pay the penalty of their impiety. Another day would come, the great and terrible day of the Lord, when the Son of man would return on a cloud, with power and great glory.

The signs that precede this coming are predominantly in the heavens, as distinguished from the previous signs, which were upon the earth. The whole discourse is couched in the language of Semitic symbolism, the language of the prophets and the psalmists, as well as the contemporary writers of apocalyptic literature. It is a graphic representation under the forms of an imagery with which the disciples were already familiar, of the terrific struggle that must occur between the forces of good and the forces of evil, before the coming in triumph of the Son of man.

For the wicked these signs will be terrible, because they have been spiritually recreant. For the righteous they are the earnest of triumphant gladness, because their redemption, their perfection in the kingdom of God, is drawing nigh. The coming of the kingdom is the equivalent of Christ's coming as King.

The kingdom of God in the teaching of Jesus has a twofold significance; or perhaps it would be truer to say that it has a twofold aspect of a single significance. It is something to appear in the lifetime of the present generation, and it is also something to become actual in the end of the age. It is already present, and it is still to come. It is present as a principle, a force in human society. It is still to be realized as an omnipresent, omnipotent, visible achievement. It is present as a redemptive power, working in the lives of men. It is still to be realized in the perfect emancipation of men from the dominion of sin; in their entrance upon the final exalted service, in mind and soul, of their King; in their vision of the face of God, and their crowning with his glory and immortality. The present redemption is but the pledge of the complete redemption in the new creation (compare Rom. 8:18-25).

And all of this is to be realized in the day of the return of the Son of man. This return is both certain and uncertain. It is certain in the impossibility of any failure of the word of Christ or the purpose of God, until all shall be fulfilled. It is uncertain in respect of the precise day or hour at which it shall come to pass. The Father alone knows that coming time, but it will be in the days of the church of Jesus Christ, and will mark the close of the time of the gentiles.

What then should be our attitude during this interval of waiting? If we truly grasp the principle of the certainty and the uncertainty of the coming of the Son of man, it will profoundly affect the life of our souls. We will not be "overburdened with surfeiting and drunkenness and the cares of this life." Why should the Master warn these poor fishermen against being overburdened with luxuries? We are accustomed to speak of the burden of poverty. The only burdens against which Jesus warned his followers were riches and their attendant self-indulgence. These things would bow down the hearts of his followers, so that in sheer exhaustion of spirit they would fall asleep to the higher considerations of life.

For Christ wants our hearts. He is one who says to us: "My son, give me thine heart." The world, the flesh and the devil say to us: "Give us your bodies and your money, and do what you please with your hearts." The service of Christ alone can occupy that which is highest in us.

There is a serious danger lest in the delay of the coming of the Saviour we may grow careless; that we may be so much occupied with the gains and pleasures of the world as almost to offer to these our hearts. Would we be glad if we were to know that the Son of man were at once to come? Or have we interests and feelings which make us averse to his coming? Do we instinctively prefer the world as it is to the world as it possibly might be, when reorganized on the appearance of our Lord? If so, we cannot prevail to escape the disasters that will befall, and to be established before the Son of man.

Rather let us be prepared for his coming. While we are in the world, let us not be of the world. His coming is certain. Our eyes shall see him. Therefore let us be constantly prepared, that we may rejoice together at his coming. For in that day is the full perfection of our salvation (compare I. John 3:1-3).

Among the most familiar of moral failures is the attempt to do good without the antecedent resolution to be good. Social morality is a corollary of personal morality.—Francis G. Peabody.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

July 20, 1913

THE MEN WITH TOUCHED TONGUES

Topic—Favorite verses. III. In the prophetical books. Hosea 14:1-9.

Some men have spoken for God. That is a truth which nobody who believes in a personal God will deny. The Hebrew figure is that of men whose lips have been touched by a coal from off the high altar of God. Their tongues have been made sacred. They have spoken the truth for the hour, and it abides for all time. These prophets were, as Dr. Babcock once said, "not foretellers, but forthtellers. Their function was to speak forth the mind of God for the guidance of man. They were men who were supremely alive to spiritual things. So enrapt of God were they, that they were heedless of earthly potentates. They told the truth, regardless of its effect upon men. And now these ancient Hebrew seers, who had a wonderful passion for social justice, are furnishing the message for the latest and fullest interpretation of God's mind toward men.

The only truth worth stating is that which can be translated into life.

The true prophet is at once a man of the hour and of the long view. His teaching is of permanent application. Thus the words spoken for the ancient Jews, amid conditions utterly different from our present life, still express the fundamental truth for today.

Times may change, but the soul of man is essentially the same. That is why the message of the true prophet is of universal application.

The best commentary on the supernatural quality of the prophetical books of the Old Testament is a visit to Assyria and Babylonia. If anything could more completely fulfill the predictions of Isaiah than the state of Babylon today, I cannot imagine it. I approached the ruins of the city of Nebuchadnezzar by the Euphrates river, and on the boat I had been reading Isaiah's prophecy of the city given over to wild beasts (Isa. 13:20-22), and as I entered the excavated palace of Nebuchadnezzar himself a jackal ran from before me! Later, on a wall, I saw perched an owl. No modern traveler has written so vivid a description of the present state of the kingdoms which oppressed the children of Israel as may be read in the Old Testament prophets.

The message of a prophet should be taken in its entirety. Our habit of reading and memorizing isolated verses often does violence to the whole truth. But this topic calls for "favorite verses" from the prophets, so occasion is taken to quote some that are familiar.

They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.—Is. 2:4.

The spirit of Jehovah shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of Jehovah.—Is. 11:2.

The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid.—Is. 11:6.

Watchman, what of the night?—Is. 21:11.

For it is precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, there a little.—Is. 28:10.

A bruised reed will he not break, and a dimly burning wick will he not quench.—Is. 42:3.

Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto Jehovah, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.—Is. 55:7.

Give unto them a garland for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness.—Is. 61:3.

I have trodden the winepress alone.—Is. 63:3.

Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting.—Dan. 5:27.

They sow the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind.—Hos. 8:7.

Your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions.—Joel 2:28.

Write the vision, and make it plain upon tablets, that he may run that readeth it.—Hab. 2:2.

For who hath despised the day of small things?—Zech. 4:10.

But unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in its wings.—Mal. 4:2.

Bring ye the whole tithe into the storehouse, that there may be food in my house, and prove me now herewith, saith Jehovah of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it.—Mal. 3:10.

NEW BOOKS

I can face without fear the limitations of age, and the transition we call death. I have love and friendship around me; I give help and sympathy whenever I can, and I do my day's work gladly. The rest is with God.—Amelia E. Barr.

New Studies in American History

Only in a few striking events has the naval side of the American revolution presented itself in a way to impress the average reader of history. To begin with, the colonies were of course dependent upon merchant vessels inadequately equipped for fighting, and upon the privateers, which soon became numerous. In the earlier period the naval operations, if they may be so dignified, were under state direction, and the naval committee of Congress proved not a very efficient substitute for divided authority. In A Naval History of the American Revolution (two volumes; Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston; $3 net) Gardner W. Allen describes with considerable amplitude of detail the significant part that was played in the determination of the war by the almost pitifully inadequate navy of the colonists, aided in some degree by the large threats and small execution of the French allies. It was, of course, the ability of numbers of small vessels, naval or privateer, to threaten and to damage British merchant shipping that counted for most; of stand-to battling between fighting craft there was little outside of the conspicuous exploits of John Paul Jones. Mr. Allen in a previous work rescued from historical obscurity the naval war with France, and here he has rendered a further service to American annals in a well studied presentation based upon what must have been laborious research. Helpful maps and illustrations are included in the two volumes.

When the distinguished historian John C. Ropes passed away he left uncompleted his history of the civil war, the two published volumes of which had already gained the respect due to an authoritative achievement. Colonel William L. Livermore, Mr. Ropes's intimate friend, and himself an authority on the military phases of the civil war, has now undertaken the completion of this valuable work. Mr. Ropes's two volumes covered most of the operations of 1861 and 1862. Colonel Livermore takes up the narrative with the earlier advances upon Vicksburg. The second volume concludes with Gettysburg. A strictly military history must necessarily sacrifice some of the interesting diversions that provide interest for the nontechnical reader. There must be no confusion between mere conjecture and assertion supported by the product of carefully sifted evidence. Colonel Livermore has not failed in this respect, nor does he fail to offer his own critical verdict in every instance of differing opinion. Move by move the several campaigns are described in text and by chart, maps and charts being bountifully supplied. The analysis is clear, the comments are succinct and the plan of the book is well calculated to keep before the student's mind the whole field of operations. (Two volumes. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Each $2.50 net.)

Colonel Livermore expresses the belief that it was unnecessary to maintain General Doubleday in his desperate position west of the town during the first day at Gettysburg, and he finds no proper justification for Sickles's change of line on the federal left. Dr. Jesse Bowman Young, a well known Methodist minister and lecturer, who was a staff officer at Gettysburg, holds a different view in The Battle of Gettysburg (Harper and Brothers, New York; $2 net). Dr. Young served his church in Gettysburg and vicinity for a dozen years immediately following the war, and has made a special study of the great battle during his post-bellum career. Though he does not claim to be a military critic, study and personal observations make his conclusions worthy of most careful consideration.

There was much uncertainty at the opening of the Gettysburg battle. The new commander, General Meade, had not yet come; Reynolds was killed; on both sides the immediate issues were in the hands of subordinate generals. To hold the enemy in check till the whole army came up was the natural thing to do. If Doubleday had been withdrawn to Cemetery hill, and if the eleventh corps had been better placed in consequence of this concentration, the course would have been different, but the sacrifice might have been greater in the end. The fact stands that Doubleday and Buford fought off any possible grand sweep of the Confederate forces against Cemetery hill until the impregnable federal line could be established. As for Sickles, he took the chance of acting beyond his instructions in advancing his line at the left. It was a grave risk that might have brought final disaster to the federal side, and in that event he would have been forever discredited. But he was saved by the quick resourcefulnes of his commander, and it will always be an open question what might have happened if he had held to the line he was expected to occupy. No one can ever settle the question finally.

Dr. Young's book provides a most interesting and well balanced account of the great battle, accompanied with a large amount of excellent biographical data concerning the participants. It is written in a spirit quite in harmony with the events of this anniversary year at Gettysburg.

In these days of many political theories that come in conflict with the organic law of the nation, it is pertinent to consider the processes by which the federal constitution was evolved. Professor Max Farrand of Yale, in his The Framing of the Constitution (Yale University Press, New Haven; $2 net) presents a concise account of the proceedings of the convention, the personalities figuring therein, the interests that influenced action and the so-called "compromises" that enabled the framers to complete their work. "The document . . . was a surprise to everybody," comments Professor Farrand. ". . . The construction was unusual. Out of what was almost a hodgepodge of resolutions they had made a presentable document, but it was not a logical piece of work. That is why every attempted analysis of the constitution has been doomed to failure." It would be worth the while of every citizen and of every student to read this very illuminating volume.

Following a different line, Professor Charles A. Beard of Columbia approaches the formulation of the constitution in An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution (Macmillan Company, New York; $2.25 net). As Professor Beard in his preface admits, his treatment of the subject is suggestive and fragmentary, rather than comprehensive and conclusive. Like Professor Farrand, he properly describes the personnel of the convention, but in his case, with regard to their financial status, most of the members he finds to be men of more or less wealth. That the constitution was formulated and its adoption secured by men of the property-holding class and that the economic interests of the several sections had much influence upon the provisions of the document is doubtless true, as Professor Beard indicates. That members of the convention profited from the increased value of government obligations following the adoption of the constitution is certain. There were men of property in opposition, however, and though the convention itself may not have been properly representative of the masses, history credits it with having made a pretty fair job of its carpentry. Professor Beard has suggested a most interesting subject for discussion and furnishes a valuable basis for further consideration.

Every reader of American history knows the name of Silas Deane, but that is usually the extent of his knowledge. Deane was elected to the Continental Congress and in 1776 was sent to France, where he signed the treaty of alliance. With Franklin and Lee he remained abroad for several years, but fell out of the good graces of Congress and died broken and discouraged. It is in the effort to clear away what he believes to be an unfair historical judgment that George L. Clark has prepared his Silas Deane: A Connecticut Leader in the American Revolution (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; $1.50 net). In spite of this effort, the impression left by the book is that Deane, however honest he may have been, was not a big enough man to meet the difficulties of his situation.

Two Important Reference Books

The Statesman's Year Book for 1913, edited by J. Scott Keltie and M. Epstein. This is the jubilee volume of this noted statistical and historical annual of the states of the world. An attempt has been made in the introductory matter and in the maps to indicate certain aspects of contrast in the last half century. The section called "Additions and Corrections" is of particular interest, bringing all statistical and historical information up to the latest available date. Tripoli, Morocco, China and the Balkan peninsula have been carefully dealt with; about 200 pages—one-seventh of the book—is given to the United States. It is impossible to estimate the real value of such a work to the various circles of readers who find it indispensable. In the realms of commerce, finance, politics, industrial production, religion, education and in many other departments it supplies information with a completeness and authority that are acquired only by a research impossible to the average man on his own account. [Macmillan Company, New York. $3 net.

The New International Year Book gives a summary of the more important events of 1912 in a volume uniform with others of the International encyclopedia, which it supplements. It is a book of 822 pages, treating the important occurrences of the past year in a very full manner. The significance of the last presidential election with the rise of a new party, the Balkan war with its far-reaching complications and the labor developments of the twelvemonth are set forth fully. The various polar expeditions, the year's developments in legislation affecting the relation of employers and workers, the advance in foreign trade, and thousands of other subjects are treated by experts. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $5 net.

New Hymnals and Choruses

Quartets and Choruses for Men's Voices, edited by George B. Hodge and Hubert P. Main. Hosts of auditors who enjoyed the singing of the association quartet as they traveled over the United States with the Men and Religion teams a year ago—the same consecrated singers who are now accompanying Fred B. Smith and Raymond Robins in a tour around the world—will be glad to have in printed form the songs and music composing their delightful and inspiring repertoire. Such is the character of this new publication, which is also copyrighted by the international committee of Y. M. C. A. Men singers in the churches who, like the association quartet, are called upon on varied occasions for both sacred and social selections will find in these 154 numbers a collection of choice and usable music not excelled —probably not even equaled—elsewhere. [Biglow and Main Company, New York. 45 cents.

The American Hymnal, edited by W. J. Dawson. In the series of Century hymnals, often commended in these columns for their high standards and wise arrangement, this latest number is the largest and on the whole the most ambitious. Dr. Dawson, pastor of First Presbyterian church of Newark, N. J., though yet not more than ten years a resident of America, has so fully and congenially adapted himself to American life that there is no irrelevance in requesting him to prepare a real American hymnal. His well known literary taste and catholic sympathies qualify him well to accomplish the high purpose suggested—the creation of a hymnal sufficiently complete to meet all normal needs of Christian worship and sufficiently characteristic of the common notes of Christianity to appeal to all bodies of Christians of whatever denominational name. All the old standard historic hymns are embraced in the 700 numbers of the book, and likewise much of the highest worthiness from recent hymnology. The service of George Whelpton as musical editor insures the continuance of that well considered association between hymns and tunes which has made previous numbers of the Century series so acceptable. The American Hymnal is enriched by certain liturgical forms supplied by Dr. Dawson himself, and an excellent arrangement of responsive readings prepared from the American revision of the Bible by Dr. Harry E. Fosdick. [Century Company, New York.

THE PILGRIM HYMNAL, with Responsive Readings and Other Aids to Worship; edited by Charles L. Noyes and Charles L. Ziegler. This is an enlarged, enriched and revised edition of the well known "Pilgrim Hymnal" and is the concluding volume in the Pilgrim series of hymn books. It is the sort of volume that adequately attains the ideal of its editors as given in the preface, namely, "a book of moderate size, admitting nothing which has not poetical or musical merit, no verse which is not a hymn lyrical and worshipful, no tune which is not singable, devout . . .; hospitable to the new from every source, yet giving the larger place to the old hymns and tunes of proved worth and enduring vitality." The editing has been done with especial carefulness. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. $1 net.

Miscellaneous

OLD HOMES OF NEW AMERICANS, by Francis E. Clark. Dr. Clark of Christian Endeavor fame has been a world traveler. His book on South America, "The Continent of Opportunity," attracted attention to that country as no other book did. This new book is on the country and the people of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, and their contribution to the new world. Dr. Clark has noticed with what contempt many people look on immigrants, especially those from southern Europe. In this volume he tells the story of the lands from which they come, and on this bases an argument for the future of America as these people enter it. At times the volume rises to real eloquence, and never fails of interest. Dr. Clark has a sure sense of the important things, and no one can ever feel contempt for men who have back of them such history as he describes. Home mission speakers ought to commend the book as widely as their voices will carry. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.50 net.

THE WORLD'S LEADING CONQUERORS, by W. L. Bevan; LEADING AMERICAN INVENTORS, by George Iles. Two interesting new volumes, each the latest issue in its series. The first contains accounts of Alexander the Great, Cæsar, Charles the Great, the Ottoman sultans, the Spanish conquistadors and Napoleon. The second is devoted to John and Robert Stevens, Fulton, Whitney, Blanchard, Morse, Goodyear, Ericsson, McCormick, Sholes, Howe, Tilghman and Mergenthaler. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. Each $1.75 net.

SONG AND STORY SERVICE. This series of pamphlets offers an interesting means of bringing to bear instructive impressions of great Christian lives upon popular audiences. Each includes a succinct biography of the character under consideration, which can be read from the pulpit with appropriate music interspersed at intervals. Dr. Grenfell, Dwight L. Moody, Fannie J. Crosby, General Booth and David Livingstone are some of the titles thus far introduced into the series. [Tullar-Meredith Company, New York.

THE EFFICIENT AGE, by Herbert Kaufman. This modest volume takes little space, but if read on a vacation will bring a man back to his work with more zest than will a trunkful of novels. The chapters are short; the ideas pungent; the effect stimulating. Every young man eager to work will cherish this book. It will help adjust the ideas of the college graduate to the work of the world. [George H. Doran Company, New York. 75 cents net.

The Open Hearth

[Writers of letters to The Open Hearth are reminded that excessive length of their contributions operates to shut out other participants in current discussions. Three hundred words is an acceptable maximum. Communications of greater length will be cut down, or will be returned if marked "in full or not at all."]

Colored Commissioners at Atlanta

"The popular meeting of the Atlanta Assemblies in the interest of work among colored people was all right with one exception; there should have been a colored man put on the program to present the cause from the negro's viewpoint."

The above editorial paragraph in The Africo-American Presbyterian alludes in a very mild way to the lack of consideration shown the "colored brother" at the late lamented meeting of the General Assembly in Atlanta. It is interesting, if not significant, to note that the last trainload of commissioners had hardly got out of sight of the Union station before the white citizens of Atlanta became actively interested in laws that would segregate its colored citizens. It is to be regretted that, with the holding of the union communion and numerous mass meetings by the Assemblies, the spirit of brotherhood did not get in its "perfect work." But, of course, as practiced by some of our church courts brotherhood does not take the black man into account. It may have its application to the "heathen Chinee" and the "dago," but only in a remote fashion to the negro. Brotherhood is handed to him in a long-handled spoon.

The "Atlanta spirit" rather than the Christian spirit seems to have kept the "brother in black" from appearing on the program held in his interest. It is peculiarly unfortunate that the Northern Assembly feels compelled to fall down and worship the fetish of southern prejudice and caste that refuses to accord all men a square deal even in the church of God. How narrow and inconsistent all of this must appear as we shall view it fifty or a hundred years hence. CHARLES A. WARD.

Christians Outside the Church

I have read with edifying interest your answer to the question: "Can one be a Christian without joining the church?" I should like to add just two further statements for the benefit of the honest inquirer.

First, inasmuch as every such inquirer says without hesitancy, "Of course, I shouldn't want to live where there is no Christian church," then would he take a position that, if followed generally, would not only discredit the church but would exterminate it? For it is evident that if you can be a Christian without the organized church, I can, likewise, and so can my neighbors one and all.

My second proposition is this: It would be a selfish thing in me to ask others to carry on an institution in the community where I would not live were it not there just for my benefit. Christianity is not selfish. But my outside Christian says, "I support the church with my means"—as if a man is not worth more than his purse.

The Christian trying to live without the church has about as much chance for his life as the sheep has in a wolf-infested country outside of the fold. It is a dangerous and absurd position. A. M. WORK.

Socialism Emphasizes Brotherhood

In a recent issue a Continent editorial makes reference to Morris Hillquit's book, "Socialism Summed Up." While for straightforward thinking and honesty of opinion The Continent is unsurpassed by any religious paper in the country, yet the editorial referred to is about as misleading as the advertisement with regard to George D. Herron's book, "The Spiritual Side of Socialism." Mr. Herron's personal conduct is not to be condoned in the least, but it has been exaggerated and magnified by those who determined he should not continue his teaching at Grinnell. It is an accredited fact that under any circumstance he would have "lost his academic chair" because of the strong opposition to his views of applied Christianity. But be all that as it may, our fair-minded editor suggests that many people hold back from socialism "from a haunting fear that their propaganda somehow threatens the sanctity of family life." Political editors quite naturally have let loose such bugbears among the people, but religious periodicals should pronounce themselves more cautiously.

Any wideawake individual, who really believes in the kingdom of God on earth, can see in the great socialist movement in Europe and in America the greatest single definite advance, in the economic and material world, to the age of universal peace and good will. This movement is bound to go on, and we ought not to antagonize it, as the Roman Catholic Church has done and is doing. It belittles the cause of Christ to strike at a great propaganda, which may have among its leaders some who are not avowed Christians, yet in all its official platforms and documents, as set forth in conventions and assemblies, it upholds the sanctity of the home, and never in any way reflects upon the religion of Jesus Christ. It can be said of its leaders what cannot be said of most leaders of political parties—they emphasize in reality the true spirit of brotherhood.

A Church Business Corporation

The agencies of the church have in the past few years made such progress in their administration along the lines of efficiency and economy that it seems the time may be ripe for the church to go further and develop a system by which the entire business end of the boards, permanent committees, etc., can be cared for separately from the essentially religious by a distinctly business organization.

The membership of our denomination contains men of experience in the largest business organizations of the country, who would no doubt be glad to give their services in perfecting a "church corporation," which would carry on all the business affairs of the denomination. The gain would certainly be for efficiency and economy, but best of all, it would leave our secretaries free to give their undivided time and thought to the religious purposes of these organizations, thus making for a large extension of their time in that direction. We have on hand some of the principal agencies around which such a "church corporation" could be built:

1. A board of directors; i. e., the trustees of the General Assembly.
2. A "plant"; i. e., the Board of Publication.
3. Two fine administration buildings, one in New York and one in Philadelphia. In either one of these all the business could be segregated.

Tentatively, there would be departments of (a) finance; (b) accounts; (c) printing and publication; (d) law, real estate, insurance, etc.; (e) purchases and publicity.

It can readily be seen that all the business of all the boards brought together under these heads, and yet kept distinct in the department, would tend to economy, uniformity and efficiency. No faithful servant of the church need be deprived of a position, but as official places are vacated for one reason or another, there is no doubt that under the proposed consolidation some of the posts could be done away with. The change would involve detail in its arrangement, but appears perfectly practicable and in consonance with present business methods, if conservation is to enter into the affairs of the church. What a gain, if we could release our secretaries and others from the care of the material portion of the boards' affairs!

If the Board of Publication were to take over all the printing and publication, no doubt its profits would go a great way toward meeting the expenses of the proposed "Church Corporation." P. R. P.

In Favor of Church Colonizing

The time has come for the church to adopt the policy which has prevailed among the United Presbyterians, the Catholics, the Mormons and some other bodies. Dr. Stevenson's article in The Continent on "Mormonism" proves clearly that our present method of working in Utah and adjoining states is a comparative failure.

The Mormons colonize. We, on the contrary, go into their neighborhood as individuals, and families refuse to stay because they do not wish to bring up their children among Mormon children. The only way to surmount this difficulty is for our church to adopt the policy of colonization.

But the same thing is true for a different set of reasons in the South. The fact that the southern states are already largely occupied and the presence everywhere of a colored population makes it difficult to induce isolated families to emigrate into these states. Yet there is room for them everywhere.

Northern real estate men are making captivating offers of all kinds of land and business opportunities in all the southern states. But the people are suspicious of the offers for two reasons: First, for fear of finding themselves isolated in an uncongenial neighborhood; and second, because they suspect that these real estate men are working not for the interest of the South but for their own pockets.

Now the church can overcome all the difficulties by colonizing the people where all their rights will be protected and where it will be to the interest of states and cities to have the country occupied and improved. If the Southern, the Northern and the United Presbyterian Home Boards will appoint a joint commission to cooperate with righteous business associations of the South and give colonization a full and fair trial, such cooperation will help along church unity, will build up our churches and schools on a solid foundation and will give us strongholds in the South and West where our forces are today weak and scattered.

Is Christianity a Failure?

Price Collier in one of his articles on "Germany and the Germans" in Scribner's Magazine, speaking of the immense burden of the German army and navy, says: "Humanity has indeed made but a poor zigzag progress from the gorilla; Christianity, just now engaged in blessing the rival banners of warriors setting out for one another's throats, has failed ignominiously to bring the wolf in man to baptism when the central state of Christian Europe must arm to the teeth one in every eighteen of her adult male inhabitants and spend half a billion dollars a year to protect herself from assault and plunder."

One of several resolutions adopted by the representatives of the woman's party of Illinois and included in an open letter to the state legislature condemns the divorce commission in the state and declares: "Under the regime of 'sanctity' the race has become infected to the extent of 85 or 90 per cent with deadly diseases and white slavery has grown to gigantic proportions, while insanity, feeble-mindedness, defectiveness, delinquency and crime are increasing much faster than the population."

If the charge against Christianity contained in these two quotations is to be accepted as true, then may we well write the ancient "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin," over against it. But is it true? That we are not absolutely overwhelmed by the tide of evil is due to the dikes and safeguards of Christianity, and these forces are backed by the silent but solid moral integrity of the mass of mankind. That moral integrity is created and maintained by the Christian religion. In Christian homes, churches, Sunday schools, prayer rooms—things our militant reformers too often ignore—are manufactured the imperishable convictions of truth, purity and benevolence, which, in spite of seeming inertia and symptoms of inefficiency, is, nevertheless, the one thing that makes victory over evil possible and lends a reasonable hope to every reform. To denounce Christianity as a failure in the warfare with sin is foolish; to attempt any reform that involves the passions of human nature without it is to court failure.

When we shall really awake to the fact that a power that makes for righteousness does exist and is available in abundant strength to heal all our moral and social ills, then will many of our reforms themselves be reformed and a less pessimistic view of Christianity entertained.

F. G. WESTPHAL.

Is the Minister an Exploiter?

A writer in "The Contributors' Club" of The Atlantic Monthly insists he is; not an exploiter, however, of other men but of his own spiritual life for the purpose of earning his daily bread.

This anonymous Atlantic writer says of ministers: "Their religious life, their deepest convictions, their profoundest visions, these are, to put it most crudely, their stock in trade, their business capital. . . . At certain hours of the week the minister must summon from its hiding place the spirit of prayer, he must literally exploit it for the edification of a hundred or five hundred or a thousand listeners. At certain other hours he must call forth his most solemn convictions about life and death and exploit them in the same way. . . . Can we wonder that the weakness of the ministry is along the line of hypocrisy, of the over-facile in expression, of the cheaply ready in sympathy—that ministers sometimes develop a professional manner?"

And here is the remedy proposed for restoring the ministry to sincerity and virility: "There is enough practical work waiting to be done to keep all the ministers busy, if they never again made a reluctant prayer or delivered an enforced sermon. There are many people who think that an institutional church and a liturgical service is the ideal for the future."

Every minister must feel that this finely written article does point out the supremest danger of his life, the danger of religious unreality and professionalism. But like many other clever critics this Atlantic critic has been unable to keep his rhetoric within the limits of fact. Ministers such as Alexander Maclaren, Henry Ward Beecher, Phillips Brooks and a host of others, who have put the emphasis upon the spiritual side of their ministry as distinct from its practical side, were certainly not men lacking in moral fiber, nor men "more to be pitied than the clowns" in the circus. They were not men who exploited their soul's life.

Ministers of the right sort do not preach and pray to make a living. So true is this that if there were no other way to secure the privilege of leading a company of people in the worship of God, and of declaring the message from God which burns in the heart, a true minister, if he had the independent means, would gladly pay to a church a salary for the opportunity of serving as its minister.

The escape from the danger of professionalism is not to be found by way of institutional work and a liturgical service, but through a deeper fellowship with God. He who lives in constant companionship with the living Christ is never compelled to pray, but is habitually in the spirit of prayer. For such a man preaching is not a dreaded task, it is an exalted privilege.

Theological Aberration

Only one man—the Son of man—since man's beginning has been fully consistent with himself theologically. It is a weakness of the human intellect not to see the totals of things in all of their relations. So a truly great and good man may accept, for example, the prophetic historicity of the Son of man for hundreds of years before he is born—entertain no shadow of doubt of it, base his faith in the divinity of the Son of man upon it—and yet, clear at the end, just as the prophecies are being fulfilled, stagger at the method of fulfillment in the virgin birth.

"Is it a small thing for you to weary men, but will ye weary my God also?" If Isaiah 7:14, quoted in Matthew 1:23, is accepted, on what ground is Matthew 1:20 questioned? Are we not in danger of wearying God with our theological quibblings?

Anti-Saloon Convention Prospects

Churches, Sunday schools and young people's societies are entitled to representation in the national convention of the Anti-Saloon League, which will be held in Columbus, Ohio, Nov. 10 to 13. This meeting will mark the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the league and it is expected that there will be a very large attendance. At previous conventions representation has been based on membership in state and national bodies. A number of governors and other officials have already promised to be present. At this meeting it is expected that great impetus will be given to the proposed campaign for federal constitutional prohibition.

A FABLE—For Wise Folk

I HAVE FINISHED MY COURSE · I HAVE KEPT THE FAITH · I HAVE FOUGHT A GOOD FIGHT · PRESBYTERIAN MINISTERIAL RELIEF AND SUSTENTATION · WITHERSPOON BUILDING · PHILADELPHIA · PA.

Three men were standing on the steps of a church in which they had just heard a man with a message. The names of these three men were—

Easy Going Optimist
Thorough Going Pessimist
and
Up and Going Possumist

The man with a message was a champion of the disabled servants of the church, their desolate widows and defenseless orphans. His message was "Millions for Ministerial Relief and Sustentation."

Said Easy Going Optimist: "That man has a snap. Why, I could raise that money in a year. He oughtn't to waste his time speaking in churches, though. He ought to get after millionaires like Rockefeller and Carnegie. It is a great cause and the money will come running in like the tide. No, I didn't sign a subscription card. They don't need my gift. The rich people will give it all right."

Quoth Thorough Going Pessimist: "It's utterly hopeless. Everything is going to smash. Only a fanatic would think of raising Ten Million Dollars for anything. Hard times are coming. The ministry has lost its grip. The church doesn't appeal to red-blooded men any more. I would never send a dollar of mine on such a fool's errand."

Answered Up and Going Possumist: "You are both utterly wrong. It won't be done in a day, but it will be done. The millionaire must do his part, but that does not excuse you from doing yours. I am glad that I am able to help. I signed a subscription card this morning and I am mighty glad to have a man's part in a job that's big enough for a big church."

MORAL—"Possumist" comes from a Latin word, meaning "I can." May his tribe increase!

News of Summer Conferences

Study Missions at Mount Hermon

The Federate School of Missions will be held at Mount Hermon, in the Santa Cruz mountains, Cal., July 20-27. Mrs. D. B. Wells will conduct the classes in two new textbooks—"The New America" and "The King's Business." She will also give daily talks on Bible subjects. The young people's hour will be conducted by Mrs. G. L. Hagaman, state Christian Endeavor society missionary secretary. Rallies of different denominations will be held during the week. This school has now seven denominations united. Among the speakers who are expected to address the school are Miss M. Irelan, missionary from Mexico; Miss Isabel Crawford, formerly Baptist missionary among the Kiowa Indians of Oklahoma; Rev. or Mrs. W. H. Brewster (Methodist), with twenty-eight years' experience in missionary work in China.

Winona School Has Many Speakers

The interdenominational committee of the Central West held the annual session of its summer school for missions at Winona Lake, Ind., June 19-27. Though "The World in Chicago" and the floods in Ohio and Indiana interfered somewhat with the attendance, there were 310 enrolled, besides many young women carrying on special lines of work.

The home mission book, "The New America," dealing with immigration, was taught by Mrs. D. B. Wells of Chicago. Mrs. Henry M. Hunter of Oak Park, Ill., presented the foreign textbook, "The King's Business." Mrs. Mary Clark Barnes, author of a primer for teaching English to immigrants, showed very clearly that the knowledge of English is the immigrant's greatest need. Mrs. J. N. Reed and Mrs. D. E. Wiber presented very helpful methods for imparting to children a knowledge of and love for missionary work.

Mrs. George W. Coleman of Boston, president of the Council of Women for Home Missions, explained the work of the council and gave the latest inside information on Mormonism. Others who gave addresses were Rev. Allan O. Becker of India, Rev. George B. Safford of Chicago and Dr. E. A. Steiner of Grinnell, Iowa; Dr. E. H. Richards, who has spent many years working in the heart of Africa, and many missionaries, who gave familiar talks about their work.

Brotherhood Has Share at Winona

Arrangements are being completed for active participation by the brotherhood in the Bible conference at Winona Lake during the latter part of August. William Jennings Bryan will open the men's share in this meeting by an address on "Men's Opportunity in the Church" Sunday afternoon, Aug. 4. The 4 o'clock hour each day until the end of the conference will be taken by such men as John Willis Baer, Dr. S. S. Palmer and Dr. W. H. Foulkes. Dr. J. E. Henderson, associate national secretary of the brotherhood, is in charge of this addition to Winona activities.

Ways of Working

Suggests Rest for Laborers

Dr. Robert Watson, pastor of the Church of the Covenant, Cincinnati, Ohio, takes the part of the working people of that city in suggesting to employers in his congregation sufficient rest time during the hot weather. In the church bulletin he says:

"The heated season is once again upon us. Many of our people are able to leave the city for a longer or shorter time and thus get an opportunity to recoup their strength and nervous energy. To the great bulk of the people in our city, however, this season only means a greater strain on them in doing their regular weekly work. We would, therefore, urge upon all employers and overseers to plan for the comfort and welfare of their employees. Many of the offices, stores and factories close on Saturday afternoons, and we would urge all our people to aid in every way possible to secure for every worker in our city the Saturday afternoons off during June, July and August, and also early closing hours during other days of the week. We would suggest to all shoppers to do all their buying early in the day, and never on Saturday afternoons or any evening, whether in large or small stores. Plan to be thoughtful and kind to everyone who waits upon you or in any way serves you, and wherever you can lend a hand or relieve a burden or cheer with a smile, do so."

Play Ball with Boys

The boys of a church can be attracted very often through games in which their elders compete against them. Grand Junction (Colo.) church is one of the organizations which has made use of baseball in this way. Boys of one of the younger classes were lined up against the gray-haired men of the adult Bible class. The elders were beaten 16 to 1 in a game lasting two hours and twenty minutes composed of three innings of fifty-six errors each.

Outdoor Services in the Summer

First church, Williamsport, Pa., by uniting with six other churches in an open air service in a park near the church has solved the summer Sunday evening problem. Freak programs of all sorts are forbidden, but with good music a large attendance is obtained each evening.

had a most delightful time, and I'm going to send my daughter over here to learn your knack of arranging curtains so a man can look out."

As Mrs. Stone and her guests walked home from the housewarming Miss Alton dropped behind with Jay Ellis, out of hearing of the rest. "Never again will I say anything about village people and their inquisitive ways," she said with conviction. "We've known Mary for years and watched her drop from good places to poor ones without ever concerning ourselves in the least to help her, and that village boy—he is only a big overgrown boy—got at the root of the matter in a few weeks and found the right place for her. Now I think of it, we might have known all along that Mary wanted some domestic task, as all her tastes run in that direction; but we were too polite to help her."

"There's a great deal in that," said Jay thoughtfully. "John Stanley is bound to climb the ladder, and what's better, he will help others up as he goes himself."

CUBS' FOOD

They Thrive on Grape-Nuts

Healthy babies don't cry, and the well-nourished baby that is fed on Grape-Nuts is never a crying baby. Many babies who cannot take any other food relish the perfect food, Grape-Nuts, and get well.

"My baby was given up by three doctors, who said that the condensed milk on which I had fed her had ruined the child's stomach. One of the doctors told me that the only thing to to would be to try Grape-Nuts, so I got some and prepared it as follows: I soaked 1½ tablespoonfuls in one pint of cold water for half an hour, then I strained off the liquid and mixed 12 teaspoonfuls of this strained Grape-Nuts juice with 6 teaspoonfuls of rich milk, put in a pinch of salt and a little sugar, warmed it and gave it to baby every two hours.

"In this simple, easy way I saved baby's life and have built her up to a strong, healthy child, rosy and laughing. The food must certainly be perfect to have such a wonderful effect as this. I can truthfully say I think it is the best food in the world to raise delicate babies on and is also a delicious, healthful food for grown-ups, as we have discovered in our family."

Grape-Nuts is equally valuable to the strong, healthy man or woman. It stands for the true theory of health. "There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

Mennen's the Pioneer Borated Talcum

Year after year, millions of babies are rubbed with Mennen's.

It is the original talcum, the oldest and safest on the market—the one most in demand, preferred by doctors and nurses for its known purity.

It prevents and relieves chafing, prickly heat, rash—all skin discomforts to which babies are subject.

Three Denominations in Los Angeles Plan on Cooperation—Home Board Takes Charge of Mexican Work.

LOS ANGELES—Presbytery at its June meeting authorized the Church Extension Board to enter into an arrangement of comity with the United Presbyterian and Congregational churches of this city by which there shall be conference and mutual agreement among these ecclesiastical bodies before lots are purchased or new churches established in the city.

Under the new arrangement in this presbytery the Home Board at New York is to assume entire support and control of the Mexican work in Los Angeles Presbytery. This has formerly been under the direction of the home mission committee of presbytery. The Church Extension Board finds that its hands are full with the support of the mission and church extension work, and now gladly turns over the Mexican work to the Home Board. It is expected that the Home Board will also assume responsibility for half the salary of the superintendent of missions in Los Angeles Presbytery.

First church of Inglewood was dedicated June 22. The building was completed two years ago, but the congregation decided to wait till it was free from debt before it was dedicated. The pastor is Rev. T. E. Stevenson.

Rev. Walter E. Edmonds, pastor at Glendale, was recently elected president of the ministers' association.

Nine Weeks of Tent Meetings

Federated Churches of Milwaukee Holding a Series of Special Summer Services—Vacation Bible Schools in Session.

MILWAUKEE—Tent meetings, with Rev. J. B. McMinn as preacher and George Preston as singer, are being held in the city this summer under the auspices of the Federated Churches. The meetings will be continued for nine weeks, allowing three weeks to each of the principal sections.

On June 25 Rev. Archie I. Mann, pastor of North Milwaukee church, was united in marriage to Miss Madeline C. Harnley of Oshkosh.

July 7 the daily vacation Bible schools, of which there are seven, began a six weeks' term. Faith mission chapel will have one of the schools under the leadership of its pastor, Rev. Oliver C. Chapin.

Rev. H. A. Van Griethuysen of Oostburg church is spending the summer in his native land.

Rev. Samuel P. Todd, after the strain incident to the financing and building of a new church at Berean, is taking a much needed vacation. He will revisit his old home at Bay City, Mich., preach two Sundays at Northminster church, New York City, and attend the Gideon convention on his return through Toronto.

George C. Schmid, a student in Carroll College, who for three years has been supplying Northminster chapel, recently underwent an operation for appendicitis. He is now out of danger.

John Ver Straate, a graduate of Carroll College and a member of this year's graduating class in Princeton Seminary, was ordained in the chapel of Carroll College at a special meeting of presbytery June 18.

Wycliffe Club members were the guests of Dr. W. O. Carrier, president of Carroll College, June 18 at the commencement exercises.

His many friends in Wisconsin regret the probability of losing Dr. Barton B. Bigler, pastor of First church of Racine, from the state. He has been called to Memorial church of St. Augustine, Fla. E. A. C.

Watch Names of Excise Board

Washington Fears Partial Loss of Temperance Advance—Sunday Schools Have 600 Members in Town of 1,200 Persons.

WASHINGTON—The Christian people of the entire nation have shown deep interest in the heroic efforts being made for better temperance laws in the District of Columbia, and they have rejoiced with Washington people in the victories achieved in the closing hours of the last Congress. The new laws, which contemplate the closing of about half the saloons of the city, and should prevent any new saloons in purely residence districts, were effective July 1. An excise board of three members, appointed by the President, is responsible for enforcing these laws. The friends of temperance in Washington are greatly concerned just now by reason of the nominations which have been made for this board, which bid fair to nullify absolutely the better provisions of the new law just going into effect. Officers of the Anti-Saloon League and other temperance people are doing all in their power to induce the President to withdraw at least one of his nominations, which is that of a man known and recorded to have been aggressively opposed to every feature of the new law he will be expected to enforce.

One of the promising chapels of Fourth church, J. T. Kelly, D. D., pastor, is located at Berwyn, just outside the District of Columbia. Rev. William Eisenberger of the last class of Princeton Seminary has been installed here.

At a recent Sunday morning service in Sixth church the pastor, Dr. A. W. Spooner, who is endowed with unusual powers of effective delivery, instead of the sermon recited the entire sermon on the mount as recorded by Matthew.

uffalo Has Church Facts Up to Date—Will Help Newcomers—Clubhouse for Working Girls Living Alone in City.

BUFFALO—First church is having a study ade of its parish. Buffalo has now been retty well covered by the local church parish rveys. The study of these parishes makes ow the survey of the entire city a comparavely easy matter. The experiments which the cal churches are making in keeping these rveys up to date and in the follow up methods f reaching the nonchurch-goers are bringing light a system which can be employed for e whole city. The secretary of the Federaon of Churches has just completed a comrehensive map giving the location of all of e local religious agencies, with the hope of aving the federation take advantage of these cal surveys made by Presbyterian churches.

Presbyterian churches are also putting forth definite effort to learn of newcomers and to xpress the interest of the churches in them means of a strangers' bureau. A letter in e name of the presbytery has been sent to all astors of western New York requesting the ames of families or individuals coming to uffalo and assuring them of the desire of the urches to give them a welcome.

Westminster church has been the first to open clubhouse for girls who are compelled to live a boarding house. The clubhouse is located ot far from Westminster settlement and girls f the club are to be given the free use of the ouse library and gymnasium. The generous onation on the part of Westminster church as enabled the club to keep the price of board s low as $3.50 a week. An announcement of e club was sent with the first circular letter f the strangers' bureau.

The Presbyterian Union has just elected its ew officers. The retiring president, Clinton S. radley, declined reelection in order that he ight concentrate his efforts as chairman of a ommittee whose aim is the betterment of oarding house conditions.

Hold Sixty Summer Bible Schools

Evangelistic Work in Philadelphia Is Extensive—Church Has Sane Fourth Celebration on Lawn—Worker Goes to China.

PHILADELPHIA—The Prebsyterian summer evangelistic committee opened its fifteenth season of tent and open air services and daily vacation Bible school work July 7. Funds are assured for a successful campaign. About eighty workers will be engaged. Of the sixty vacation Bible schools carried on in the city during July and August thirteen will be under Presbyterian auspices and those in charge of them will be college men. A training school for teachers was held for three days the last week in June and about 150 received instruction for the work.

North church, Dr. George S. Burnfield pastor, held a "safe and sane" Fourth of July celebration on the church lawn. An elaborate program was conducted by the Sunday school, embracing a flag raising, recitations and patriotic and other songs. There was a short address.

Rev. George A. Becker, a representative of The Continent in Philadelphia, was recently installed pastor of the new Woodbury Heights (N. J.) church. The sermon was preached by W. Courtland Robinson, D. D., of this city. The congregation gave Mr. and Mrs. Becker a reception, and at the Fourth of July celebration of the Woodbury Heights Improvement and Fire Association at Glen Terrace Lake Mr. Becker was the orator.

BIG SUNDAY SCHOOL REUNION

Twenty thousand men, women and children, principally children, the representatives of many Sunday schools in eastern Pennsylvania, held a reunion June 30 in Willow Grove park. Rev. W. E. Needham, the "artist preacher," was the chief speaker.

Miss Mary I. Craig, who two years ago graduated from the Presbyterian Training School for Christian Workers, and has been connected for a year or more with Third church as a worker, will go to China as a missionary in September. A farewell reception was given her recently by Third church and scores of women and children from the downtown section, where she labored, were present. She will be succeeded at Third church by Miss May Byerly of Lancaster, Pa.

The Lemon Hill Evangelistic Association, which holds meetings each Sunday in Fairmount park, is securing signers to a petition to the Fairmount park commissioners for the erection of a $25,000 pavilion in which to hold their meetings.

At a union meeting of the ministers it was voted unanimously to protest against the disbarment from the mails by the government of a western publication because of its attacks upon the Roman Catholic Church.

Tabor church, Rev. W. B. Skillman pastor, having over 1,500 members, has secured and dedicated a lot in a prominent cemetery as a burial place for members who have no lot at the time of death. If unable to pay for it, it will be donated.

Dudley T. Richman, president of the Presbyterian Superintendents' Association, has been chosen chairman of a committee to organize a campaign for 5,000 members of the Philadelphia Bible conference to be held the coming fall.

Y. M. C. A. SECRETARY IN PEKING

Lawrence D. Howell, son of Rev. J. B. Howell of this city and former missionary to Brazil, a recent graduate of Princeton University, is under appointment by the Princeton Alumni Association as secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of the legation guards at Peking, China. He expects to sail the middle of August.

Second church, Germantown, Rev. J. Harvey Lee pastor, will conduct a camp for boys of the Sunday school this summer at Wildwood on the New Jersey coast. It will be under the leadership of a committee of boys' work of the brotherhod. The boys will be asked to contribute toward their expenses.

Manayunk church, Rev. George N. Makely pastor, has decided to enlarge its church building providing the cost can be brought within $7,500 and at least $2,500 in cash be raised.

The Anti-Saloon League is planning a vigorous campaign in this city and in several counties adjacent.

Visit All Churches in a Day

Novel Survey Made in San Francisco—Needs of Various Parishes Seen—St. Paul's Church May Be Moved.

SAN FRANCISCO—A novel scheme for a one-day complete metropolitan church survey was put in operation by the Presbyterian ministers of this city when they took a day off June 24 and visited every church of their denomination in a big sight-seeing automobile. They took the entire day, and twenty-six of the ministry and eldership composed the party. In the morning they visited the different parishes north of Market street and Sloat boulevard, comparing their work with that of the other denominations and philanthropic organizations engaged in the same districts. At noon they returned to the center of the city, taking luncheon together where those whose business engagements would not permit them to be of the party could hear the reports and take part in discussions. The afternoon trip carried them through the Mission, Holly Park, Glen Park, Sunnyside, the Croker Tract, Visitation Valley, Bay View, University Mound and the Potrero, all unique and separate sections of the city. The plan had never been tried before, but it was a complete success in furnishing the majority of presbytery with identical visualized data of San Francisco's home mission problems and possiblities. In each church visited prayer was offered. Rev. E. F. Hall, district secretary of the Foreign Board, was the originator of the survey. He was assisted by Rev. A. R. Willis of Bethany and Elder H. E. Bostwick of Trinity.

San Francisco Ministers and Elders Who Made Day's Tour of City's Churches and Missions

As an immediate result of the survey it was made evident that the Sunday school missionary recently requested for San Francisco was very urgently needed. It was also agreed that the present location of St. Paul's church, out near the beach, must be abandoned for a more sightly and central location. It has been attempting to minister to a growing population of many thousand in the merest shell on an inside depressed lot. A similar understanding exists concerning Glenside church. The visit to Memorial church left the party in considerable doubt as to the advisability of further effort in that varying parish. Slides have been prepared of the various churches and districts by Rev. A. R. Willis, and these will be sent around through the churches for the use of pastors.

Conduct Eleven Bible Schools

Children of Baltimore Given Opportunity to Study During Vacation—Union Services for Summer Are Being Held.

BALTIMORE—The Presbyterians of Baltimore are conducting eleven vacation Bible schools this summer as a part of the mission work of the city. About $2,000 has been provided for the expenses of the summer.

First and Brown Memorial churches have begun their usual union services for the summer. Dr. F. W. Bible of Hangchow, China, preaches to the united congregation in Brown Memorial church during July and Dr. W. F. Foultes of Philadelphia will preach in First church during August.

Harold S. Pellegrin, who has been chosen assistant at Brown Memorial church, is now in California and will be ordained by Los Angeles Presbytery and will return in time to take charge of the pastoral work during August. Dr. Branch has the pastoral work during July.

The membership of Walbrook church, Rev. Henry Alexander Grubb pastor, during the past two years has been practically doubled by steady growth. The financial and missionary growth equals the membership growth. This church is remarkable by reason of the fact that four ministers have chosen it for their church home. Dr. John S. Conning, superintendent of the Presbyterian Training School; Dr. E. H. Robbins, secretary of the church extension committee; Dr. Henry Branch, stated clerk of Presbytery, and Dr. C. K. Swartz, professor of geology, Johns Hopkins University.

Try Union Services for Summer

Pittsburg Churches Readjust Their Schedules—Dr. Isaac C. Ketler, President of Grove City College, Dies.

PITTSBURG—Many Pittsburg churches will change their schedule of meetings for the months of July and August. A few of the larger churches will continue the two services, while many are planning to drop the evening service until the first of September. In some sections arrangements are being made to hold a union evening service in a near-by park or open lot. Such arrangements have been made by the churches of the Huron Hill district and Crafton. The preachers will take turns in conducting the service. Already some of the pastors have left for their summer vacation.

East Liberty church has let the contract for the erection of a marquise or canopy over the Penn avenue entrance. The material will be glass and iron and it will cost about $3,000.

The $500,000 endowment fund for Washington and Jefferson College has been completed. The time ended July 1, when it was necessary to have $400,000 in order to secure the gift of $100,000 from the General Education Board of New York. The subscriptions amounted to $440,082.

Isaac C. Ketler, D. D., LL. D., president of Grove City College, died, after a short illness, at Grove City July 1. Dr. Ketler was the founder of Grove City College, and had been at the head of the institution for thirty-seven years. During that time it grew from a little academy, with one frame building and a small plot of ground, to a thrifty college, with one of the finest grounds in western Pennsylvania. Aside from the college Dr. Ketler was the leading spirit in the Grove City Bible School, which he organized ten years ago, and which holds its sessions each year about Aug. 1. He was also a member of the board of directors in Western Theological Seminary. Dr. Ketler was the author of several books, traveled frequently in Europe and was intimately acquainted with and associated with a number of the leading educators and preachers both in England and on the continent.

SCHOOL
of Chicago
for Christian Workers
Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

Don't miss that line "for Christian Workers." That's what the Presbyterian School is for—to train Christion Workers.

A Christian Worker is one who works for Christ.

Personal acquaintance with Him and such admiration for His plans and ambitions as lead to a passion to help Him, to work for Him and under His guidance, must be the result of our training or we fail.

A Church Worker is one who works the Church.

If we send out only those who can do the work of the Church, or whose ambition it is to work for the Church, our product is not all it ought to be.

To equip Christian workers who shall bring to the pastor's aid knowledge of methods and ability to handle and put people to work is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School.

We want to correspond with women whom God is inclining to take up such work and with people who want to help them.

Will Move Mission to the Italians

Center of Ohio Street Work Is to Be Shifted—Eleventh Church Progressing in Spite of the Coming of Jews.

CHICAGO—Ohio street Italian mission will soon be moved from its present location on Halsted and Ohio streets to Noble and Ohio streets, about a mile away. This change is made by the Church Extension Board on account of the shifting of the racial center of population away from the present site of the church. The new property was erected for church purposes and is suitable for use as a mission. The old property will be sold.

A lot has been paid for by the Bohemians of Lawndale church and it is the hope to put up a building in the near future. Meetings are still being held in the home of the minister.

Open air services are being held on the lawn of Eleventh church under the direction of Rev. W. J. Ohan, pastor. This church is growing, although many of its members are being driven ahead of the Jewish invasion to the west side of Humboldt park.

Revival meetings held nightly at Popular hall on South State street under auspices of the Christian Industrial League are attracting many men who are reached by no church.

Morgan Park church last Sunday celebrated the fourth anniversary of the coming of Rev. Clyde L. Lucas with a large number of accessions. The membership has doubled in four years and the Sunday school room is crowded. Song services this summer are attracting large audiences.

Dr. John Newton Freeman, who has been associated with Dr. W. C. Covert in the pastorate at the "new" First church, retired from that position July 1. Dr. Freeman was minister in charge of "old" First church from September, 1910, to Jan. 1, 1913, and after the merging of First with Forty-First Street he remained with the congregation at the request of Dr. Covert and the church officers.

The good citizenship committee of the Church Federation Council recently sent the executive secretary, Dr. W. B. Millard, to express to Mayor Harrison the confidence of united Protestantism that he would maintain the high standard of the city school board. The federation wanted the mayor to know that it proposed no candidates, but is interested in the welfare of the schools.

Y. M. C. A. Touches Many Peoples

A club composed of all the Filipinos of Chicago was recently organized at the West side branch of the Y. M. C. A. In this same building are the headquarters of the Hindustani Club and the Cosmopolitan Club. The latter has representatives of nineteen different nations. On a recent Sunday afternoon, when a full-blooded Sioux Indian addressed a meeting, it was found that in an audience of seventy-four persons eighteen different countries were represented. The employment of a secretary for association service for Japanese young men in and about the city, together with the new work for colored men and the interest the association takes in immigrants, shows that the local Y. M. C. A. is alive to its opportunities.

Moody Bible Institute offers some specially strong attractions this coming fall. It announces G. Campbell Morgan, D. D., the great Bible expositor, of London; Sir William Ramsay, the distinguished archæologist, who is at present at Antioch in Pisidia, and who will lecture on the value of his work to New Testament problems, and Dan Crawford, the most famous missionary to Africa of modern times, called the David Livingstone of the twentieth century. These lectures, like all the other work of the institute, are absolutely free to students, both men and women. Catalogues and other information are freely sent on application to any part of the world.

Men of Hinsdale church, now without a pastor, expect to put their shoulders to the wheel and maintain the work steadily until a pastor is obtained.

As a result of the partially completed house to house canvass which was started some weeks ago at Austin church by the brotherhood 114 families have been found who have their church letters and have not presented them to any church. This experience is expected to be duplicated by every church in the city that undertakes this plan.

Endeavor church is now experiencing the most substantial growth it has enjoyed for several years. Extensive improvements are being made upon the church building. Benevolences for the current year will be increased 300 per cent over those of two years ago. Rev. E. P. Day is pastor.

Boys in the manual training class at Olivet Institute have been making a canoe, which has been tested and will be used on Lake Geneva this summer at Olivet camp.

Bethany church will undertake a canvass of the community this summer preparatory to intensive work next fall.

Earn Their Way Across Atlantic

Union Seminary Students See England—Dr. Work Expects to Resume Labors in Fall—Many to Attend Bible School.

NEW YORK—Four Union Theological Seminary students have recently returned from a trip abroad taken under novel conditions. The quartet shipped as cattlemen from New York on May 31, working their way across the Atlantic in return for a round trip passage. They visited London, Edinburgh, Stratford-on-Avon, Oxford and Cambridge Universities, the lake district and many of the great cathedrals. Through friends of Rev. James Black, a brother of Dr. Hugh Black, the young men were introduced to Lord and Lady Guthrie, who entertained them at their home, which at one time was the residence of Robert Louis Stevenson. They met Dr. Francis Brown and Dr. John Fox, who showed them many pleasant attentions and introduced them to Dr. Alexander Whyte, principal of Free Church College.

Although Madison Square church has closed for the summer, the Spanish Evangelical church meeting in the chapel will continue its services during this month.

Fourth church is closed until September. Dr. Edgar W. Work, pastor, expects to be able to resume his duties in the autumn.

The office of Presbytery of New York and of the church extension committee, room 425, 156 5th avenue, will remain open all summer.

Another Church Started

Contracts have been signed for a new church building at 240th street and Martha avenue for the church of Woodlawn Heights. Ground was broken June 30, when the first spadeful was removed by the pastor, Rev. W. Fletcher Daum.

Gipsy Smith has engaged Professor Benjamin Franklin Butts, the singing evangelist, and Mrs. Butts to assist him in a series of meetings in Danville, Virginia, in September.

The closing service for the season in Bedford church, Brooklyn, was addressed by Henry Clews, president of the American Peace and Arbitration League, who spoke in behalf of international and industrial peace.

A company of Boy Scouts of West End church attended the patriotic services held on July 6. Under the direction of the boys' work of the pastor's cabinet a West End boys' camp will be conducted near New London, Conn., during the month of July under the personal care of Rev. George R. Andrews.

Dr. William Pierson Merrill began his vacation July 1 and will return in time to preach the first Sunday in October. Dr. Robert E. Speer will be the preacher at Brick church during July. Other supplies are: Aug. 3, Dr. Daniel Evans, Andover Theological Seminary; Aug. 10 and 17, Dr. William De Witt Hyde, president of Bowdoin College; Aug. 24 and 31, Rev. G. A. Johnston Ross, Union Theological Seminary; September, Dr. Albert Parker Fitch, president Andover Theological Seminary.

Summer Course Is Popular

The summer term of the Bible Teachers' Training School at 541 Lexington avenue promises to be a great success. Several times the number of inquiries and registrations have already been made over the number had last year at this time. Members of the regular faculty are returning for the summer session. Dr. Wilbert W. White, president of the school, who was absent in Asia during the summer term a year ago, expects to conduct classes. Five main courses in Bible study are offered, with lectures by Professor James C. Stout, Dr. William Hoge Marquess, Miss Caroline L. Palmer and Dr. White, two courses in biblical theology by Dr. Louis Matthews Sweet and two courses in religious pedagogy by Dr. Robert Wells Veach and Dr. John A. Wood.

vestigating committee was held last week. Those attending were Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith, Professor William Adams Brown, Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, Henry W. Jessup, Theodore W. Morris and William S. Bennet. The next meeting was appointed for September.

The corner stone of University Heights church at 181st street and University avenue will be laid at 3:30 o'clock July 12. Rev. Percy B. Wightman is pastor. The chapel, which was erected six years ago, has been used by the congregation for all purposes, but is now utterly inadequate to meet the needs of the rapidly increasing membership. The new edifice, which will adjoin the chapel, is planned after the most up-to-date model, and besides the main auditorium will contain individual classrooms, social rooms and clubrooms. The church is situated on one of the finest sites in the Bronx, directly opposite the campus of New York University.

New York Presbytery has 191 ministers in its membership, but only seventy-one preaching stations.

School and College

J. Spencer Dickerson, editor of The Standard, has been elected secretary of the trustees of the University of Chicago, succeeding Dr. T. W. Goodspeed, retired.

Dr. L. M. McAfee, retiring president of Park College, was recently surprised by a company of friends who, through Dr. J. C. Miller, presented him with a golden token of their appreciation.

Parsons College, Fairfield, Iowa, has conferred the degree of D. D. upon Rev. Charles H. Bandy, Fategarh, India; Rev. John B. Rendall, Jr., pastor of First church, Muscatine, Iowa, and Charles L. Mattox, Hangchow, China.

Forty-one boys finished the course at Bellefonte (Pa.) Academy at the recent closing exercises. All of them have been admitted to their chosen colleges. Princeton, Pennsylvania, the University of Pittsburg and State College will get the larger share.

Through the generosity of the men of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, who already had given largely to the endowment campaign, Coe College was able to complete its fund of $500,000 for endowment and new buildings which, with the contingent gift of the General Education Board, will put this college in possession of $650,000.

Whitman College June 18 graduated forty-five, the largest class in the history of the college. The honorary degree of D. D. was conferred upon Rev. Walter B. Hinson, pastor of First Baptist church, Portland, Ore.; Rev. Horace E. Mason, pastor of University Congregational church, Seattle Wash., and Rev. Raymond Cummings Brooks, pastor of First Congregational church, Walla Walla.

Completion of the $100,000 campaign for endowment for Hastings College July 1 was celebrated at a dinner in the church. The institution thus has $200,000 to be invested on which to run the college. The time limit was extended last January for six months, and $1,700 of the amount was raised in the last five hours of the extended time. Of the amount $40,000 was raised outside the state by President R. B. Crone and Rev. W. W. Smith, field secretary.

Macalester College has established four fellowships arranged so that the holders will devote half their time to the college and be free for the rest of the day to take courses at the University of Minnesota. The preparatory department of the college has been abolished and the St. Paul School of Music, of which Enrico Sansone was director, has been absorbed in the school of music connected with the college. When the present endowment plans are completed Macalester will have resources of nearly $1,000,000, compared to $225,000 six years ago.

Samuel A. Martin, D. D., '77, lately principal of Shippensburg State Normal School, has accepted the invitation of the trustees of Lafayette College to fill the chair of mental and moral philosophy. Dr. Martin has had a distinguished career as an educator and is well known as a scholar. After graduating at Lafayette he pursued theological studies at Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, at Edinburgh, Scotland, and at Princeton. From 1895 to 1903 he was president of Wilson College, Chambersburg, Pa., and from 1903 to 1906 president of Pennsylvania College for Women, Pittsburg.

Good Things in This Issue

One of the pleasures in spending Sunday away from home during the summer is the opportunity of hearing different ministers preach. Visitors from smaller cities who go to the larger centers during the summer are anxious to attend that church whose pulpit is occupied by a man widely known as a preacher. The Continent this week takes to the home of every reader a talk by one well known preacher and an intimate sketch of a great theological thinker. On page 958 is a special message by Dr. W. P. Merrill of Brick church, New York, and on the next page is a description of Dr. James Denney by a pastor who has recently spent several months in Glasgow learning from this famed theologian.

The unfinished-story contest for young people on page 964 will attract parents and children. More than one little girl and boy has been happily surprised to find that what he wrote was good enough to publish in a national magazine, and the fact that the best contributions are paid for adds to the fun of working hard on the story.

Zurich Voyagers Hold Sunday School En Route

As soon as the Canopic steamship, with 400 passengers for the world Sunday school convention at Zurich, sailed from Boston June 12 arrangements were made for religious services on board. Each morning at 10:30 there was held a service known as the morning worship in the main dining room, attended by 150 to 200 persons. This service consisted of songs led by Dr. Bucher, who has charge of the large chorus at the Zurich convention, with his son at the piano, then the scriptural reading and prayers, usually by some minister, one morning by a lady and one morning the young people had charge.

On Sabbath at 10:30 a. m. there was a regular church service. Bishop Vincent preached the first Sabbath, Rev. Hamilton Wigle of Amherst, Nova Scotia, preached the second Sabbath. Young people's service was held on deck at 5 p. m.

At 3 o'clock on Sabbath afternoon there was a regularly organized Sabbath school with an enrollment of 397 and an average attendance of 200, with collections of $50 per Sunday. The regular departments of a well organized school were observed and the lesson taught by able teachers. This Sunday school was notable in that the first session was held in mid-Atlantic and the second in mid-Mediterranean, both sessions with very great interest and enthusiasm.

Also, when the Canopic reached places where there were mission stations stops of several hours were made, as at the Azores, Madeira, Gibraltar and Algiers. The passengers went ashore and, going at once to the mission or an appointed place, held a service, after which the rest of the time on shore was spent in sight seeing and visiting places of historic interest. The Canopic pilgrims reached Naples June 26 and Zurich some days later.

Financial Situation

Tendency Discerned to Check Outgo of Capital—Parents Can Easily Teach Lessons on Saving—A Will Often Desirable.

There is observable in the developments of recent weeks the beginning of what may be a decided tendency toward a restriction of the amount of capital put into permanent investments. It is said that the savings banks of one of the rapidly growing cities of the Pacific coast have refused to loan money upon real estate. The bankers take this means of expressing their disapproval at the inflated values which are being placed upon residence property in the outlying districts. J. J. Hill has stopped much of the construction work which the Great Northern has been doing in the Northwest, and there are other evidences of a slight letting up of extensive improvements in different lines. Many observers of the present financial situation look upon this tendency with decided approval. It is believed that this influence has come just at the right time and that it will have a very wholesome effect without causing public sentiment to swing so far the other way as to precipitate fear that money would be extraordinarily tight for ordinary demands.

The parent who on the first of July entered in a little book the interest due his child for the small savings intrusted to him as banker did that child a greater favor than the parent perhaps realizes. Many fathers on the birthday of their children give them a small amount of money. During vacation many boys earn money. If this is placed in the savings bank for them, or if the father himself acts as banker and pays the interest regularly, the child will be given lessons in saving and business for which he will always be grateful. It has been said that men of business take too little trouble in teaching their children to save and educating them along the lines of sound business.

Wife Should Have Bank Account

It is probably thoughtlessness and carelessness combined that induces these same men of affairs very often to refrain from doing those acts which would make conditions much easier for their family in the event of sudden death. Collier's Weekly in a special article points out that the failure of men to have bank accounts in the names of their wives and their delay in making a will not only often cause serious embarrassment to the surviving members of the family who are deprived suddenly of a regular supply of cash but also often result in serious loss to a business.

It is this reticence on the part of business men concerning their affairs which virtually drives widows, in their ignorance, to risky investments. Bankers often point out that a farm mortgage is one of the most desirable ways in which women left to their own financial devices may invest their money with the maximum of safety and the minimum of trouble and worry. Women usually have not the facilities for investigating stocks and bonds. As the mortgage loan business is now conducted, however, it is an exceedingly simple matter for one to invest money in securities backed by land.

Brief Bits of Business News

—Although bank clearings do not afford an entirely reliable index of the trend of business, it is interesting to note that the clearings for June in Chicago show an increase of $91,000,000 over the clearings of the corresponding month of 1912. This is the largest gain over last year since January.

—The railway systems of the country, it has been shown, consume in a year enough water to fill a reservoir 1,000 feet wide and ten feet deep from St. Paul to the Gulf of Mexico. At the rate at which the Chicago water works is now pumping water, it would take the entire plant of this city four and two-tenths years to supply the transportation lines with water.

News Notes from Various Fields

Iowa

Work has begun on the addition to the church at Paullina.

The corner stone of Rockwell City church was laid recently.

Indications are favorable for a large attendance of young people at the Storm Lake conference for young people Aug. 7-14.

Brooklyn church under the leadership of Rev. S. E. Koons is putting up a $20,000 edifice. It will not be completed until next spring.

The work of First church, Albia, has taken on new life since the coming of Rev. W. E. Fisher as pastor six weeks ago. An adult Bible class has been organized with a membership of twenty. Union services will be held Sabbath evenings during July and August in the courthouse square, and in the fall a large tabernacle meeting is arranged for under the leadership of Dr. French Oliver.

A committee of First church, Cedar Rapids, has been appointed to take under consideration the problem of remodeling the chapel in order to make room for the various departments of Sunday school which are now scattered in the different rooms of the church and chapel. The removal of the Christian and M. E. churches from the downtown district has thrown additional responsibility upon this old established church.

The new church at Vinton will soon be finished. The roof will be on in a few days. The church will have twenty-eight rooms, besides kitchen, boiler and fuel rooms and main auditorium, and will seat 1,000 persons. The building has a Y. M. C. A. department, consisting of clubrooms for boys and girls and space for gymnasium. It will cost almost $60,000 and it is expected to be dedicated in October free of debt. Rev. P. Marion Simms is pastor.

Rev. William H. Wilson, pastor of Clarinda church, preached the sermon at the dedication of the new church there June 29. Dr. W. E. Parsons, president of Parsons College, preached at a union service in the evening. A social gathering of the church took place Monday night and reminiscences of the history of the church were given at devotional service Wednesday. The church was organized in 1855 with five members. The total cost of the new building and equipment is about $35,000, which was raised before the dedication. The former building was erected about twenty-five years ago. The auditorium will seat 400 persons and there is a large number of classrooms for the use of the Bible school.

Pennsylvania

Rev. Joseph H. Odell, pastor of Second church, Scranton, has recently been made editor of The Tribune-Republican, a daily paper.

Rev. Frank B. Everett, secretary of synod committee on the brotherhood, recently conducted a conference at Altoona among the men of churches of that city and vicinity. Plans were made for an interbrotherhood union.

Rev. W. B. Cooke, a member of Carlisle Presbytery at Manila, P. I., recently sent to the moderator a gavel made in the Philippine islands. Another member of presbytery, Rev. Ray H. Carter, superintendent of village work in Moga, Punjab, India, is making arrangements to teach carpentering and blacksmithing to the natives.

At the recent dedication of the first of the series of buildings of the home for aged Masons and their wives at Elizabethtown the invocation was made by Grand Chaplain Rev. Richard Montgomery, pastor of Ashbourne church, and an oration was delivered by Dr. Maitland Alexander, a prominent Mason of Pittsburg.

Illinois

Rev. C. E. Schaible, moderator of the Synod of Kansas, has accepted a call to Bushnell. He is now pastor at Burlingame, Kan.

Woodhull church attendance has increased, especially at the evening service, at which it has doubled in a year. Recently an order was placed for a pipe organ. A new barn was immediately built to replace the one completely demolished by the cyclone of Easter night. Rev. Lewis C. Voss finished the sixth year of his pastorate in March.

The congregation of Bloomington church has decided to prosecute the project for a new building after changes have been made in the plans.

The congregation of First church, Watseka, has raised funds for the building of a church edifice to cost not less than $25,000. Plans are being prepared.

Evangelists Hart and Magann of Fairbury have just closed the last meeting of their season at Herrin, where they had about 900 conversions. Over 15,000 conversions have occurred in their campaigns during the past eighteen months.

North Dakota

Rev. Alden D. Collins was installed pastor of Rugby church June 19. Rev. Albert Torbet, Devils Lake; Rev. H. S. Morrison, pastor-evangelist, and Rev. B. A. Fahl of Calvin officiated.

Rev. T. T. Brown, for the past eight and a half years pastor of Grove church, Aberdeen, recently presented his resignation, much to the surprise of all who knew him and his field. Grove church has just completed and dedicated a beautiful new stone edifice and is in a prosperous condition.

The corner stone of the new church at Streeter was laid June 26. This is one of the visible results of the efforts of Rev. S. B. Doty, Sunday school missionary, and the few members of this church. They raised the cost, $2,100, before the building was started. The pastor, Rev. Joseph Gaston; Mr. Doty and Rev. C. W. Fye of Oakes and neighboring pastors officiated in the exercises. It is expected that the building will be dedicated by the middle of August.

Nebraska

Rev. Craig G. Whittsell was installed pastor of Holdrege church June 11. Rev. George McDougall, who was a student in the seminary with Mr. Whittsell, preached the sermon. Rev. G. E. Parisoe and Rev. J. W. Pressly also took part.

A marked feature of the Nebraska state Sunday school convention at Lincoln June 17-19 was a convocation of Presbyterians, of whom there were 150 at the denominational luncheon. Special decorations, plate souvenirs and programs combined to stress the "efficiency campaign" and "efficiency standard" proposed for the advancement of Nebraska Sunday schools. Six talks were given, all advocating a united effort upon the part of the schools of the state in adopting the synodically approved program of Sunday school advance under the leadership of the educational superintendent.

Washington

An adult Bible class and an aid society have been organized in connection with Larene church, united with Davenport under Rev. Frederick Tonge.

An interesting spirit of cooperation between the state normal school at Bellingham and First church there, Rev. J. R. Macartney pastor, is shown in arrangements made for the students and members of the faculty of the school to have entire charge of the evening service July 20. They will act as ushers, musicians and speakers. It is expected that this will be made an annual event of the summer school. The graduating class of the high school asked Mr. Macartney to preach their baccalaureate sermon in First church.

Golden Rod and Mayflower congregations are working well with their new pastor, Rev. William Mason. A parsonage at Golden Rod is in process of erection.

The statistical report of the new Presbytery of Reserve for the year just closed shows more church organizations, more money expended for congregational purposes and slight advance in contributions to home missions and temperance, despite drought and crop failure. Present prospects are for a much better record during the current year.

The church of Eureka has succumbed to the increasing prevalence of German-speaking churches, together with the German Lutheran College in the place, and after selling its house of worship to one of the German churches has disbanded.

New York

A new parsonage for Oneida church will be started soon.

Dr. James A. Williamson, pastor of the U. P. church, Johnstown, has announced that he will retire in a year at the end of a half century of service in this church. His congregation has increased over 400 per cent during his long period of service.

Dr. William A. Byrd, pastor of Trinity church, Rochester, has been appointed by Governor Sulzer state commissioner in charge of the religious aspect of the fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the emancipation proclamation to be held in New York City next fall.

The New York summer school of Sunday school methods will be held at Silver Bay July 22-29. The faculty includes leading Sunday school experts in various denominations in New York and other states. Dr. Joseph Clark, superintendent of the state Sunday school association, is dean. Each day will be divided into sections, in which general instruction will be given in the early morning, with an hour before noon devoted to the problems of various departments. There will be special lectures in the evening.

In connection with the summer school of theology at Auburn Seminary an institute will be held July 15 and 16 under the direction of the Home Board, with Rev. Warren H. Wilson and Rev. Arthur H. Allen of New York Synod in charge. It is open to all and the work of the churches in small communities will be thoroughly discussed. The speakers will be as follows: Country Life Day—Warren H. Wilson, New York; Rev. A. C. Stuart, Almond; Jared van Wagenen, Lawyersville; Rev. T. Maxwell Morrison, Bellona; Professor G. F. Warren, Ithaca; Rev. John D. McBride, Greensburg, Pa.; Professor Harold W. Foght, Washington, D. C.; Rev. A. G. Cameron, Sylvania, Pa. Immigration Day—Dr. Peter Roberts, New York; Rev. Aaron W. Maddox, Faust; Rev. Frederick H. Wright, Ridgewood, N. J.; Rev. Andrew J. Lydal, Preble; Charles L. White, D. D., New York; Rev. F. W. Fuess, Baldwinsville.

Minnesota

The boys of Red Wing church have formed a chapter of the Knights of the Holy Grail. They preferred this to a Boy Scout organization.

Dr. George E. Davies, who has been pastor of Merriam Park church, St. Paul, for three years, has been called to First church, Salt Lake City. He recently visited the field. Dr. W. M. Paden resigned this charge several months ago.

Dr. H. N. Wilson of Central church was one of the speakers at a recent mass meeting of St. Paul citizens called to demand the enforcement of law, especially the statutes relating to the sale of liquor. Recent orgies on excursion boats on the river are responsible for much of the present agitation against the saloons.

Missouri

Following the policy of emphasizing the district rather than the state conventions of Christian Endeavor, Frank Lowe, Jr., the state president, has recently completed a trip of 1,80 miles visiting eleven of twelve district conventions. There has been a large increase i the number of comrades of the quiet hour District officers have pledged to attend th state conference in Kirksville Oct. 30 to Nov. 2

The union of First and Liberty Stree churches of Independence was consummate June 29. These churches have been workin and worshiping together in a cooperative unio for six months. Liberty Street church was former Cumberland congregation. The churc came over to First church in a body, withou opposition, making the present resident membership about 500. This is the second unio to be formed with First church since D

Charles C. McGinley has been pastor. Five years ago Westminster church, South, was merged with First church. There is also the prospect of a fine addition to the present commodious building, including an up-to-date Sunday school equipment, men's clubrooms, ladies' parlors and gymnasium.

Arizona

Plans for the uniting of the Presbyterian and Congregational churches of Tucson, which have been under consideration for several weeks, have not met with the unanimous approval of the congregations and have been abandoned, although a majority favored the move.

Idaho

Rogerson church, which is grouped with Hollister under the care of Rev. D. J. Treiber, is taking steps toward the erection of a house of worship. The school house in which services are now held is no longer adequate.

Indiana

The corner stone of the new church at Bourbon was laid Wednesday, June 25, the pastor, Rev. William J. Gerlach, being in charge. Rev. William A. Sunday delivered the principal address.

Texas

Plans are being made for the erection of additional Sunday school rooms for First church, Fort Worth. The new building will probably include a gymnasium.

Utah

Rev. R. J. Patterson of Belfast, Ireland, on his way to the Pacific coast held a large meeting in Salt Lake City in the interest of temperance.

Ministerial Obituary

Rev. W. T. Bartle

The senior member of Corning Presbytery, Rev. W. T. Bartle, died in Claremont, Cal., June 19, at the age of 91 years. Funeral services were conducted at Creston, Iowa, by Rev. A. E. Kiser, assisted by Rev. A. B. DeLong and Rev. George Korteling.

Rev. James Godward

The pastor of Elbow Lake, Minn., Rev. James Godward, died May 14. His entire ministerial life was spent in Red River Presbytery, and he was for many years chairman of the home missions committee. He was born in England sixty-eight years ago and is survived by a widow and twelve children, including W. A. Godward, president of New Rockford (N. D.) College.

Refuse to Reelect Catholic Teachers

By a vote of 5 to 10 the school board of Charlotte, N. C., recently refused to reelect two school teachers for the coming year, the issue being that they were Roman Catholics. It is said that most of the children of Roman Catholic parents attend parochial schools and that only seven such children are in the public schools. The debate over the list of teachers was spirited and the board was forced to retire behind locked doors for a secret ballot. The ministerial association adopted resolutions expressing their disapproval of the employment of any teacher not in sympathy with the teachings of the Bible.

The Chinese famine victims, in the last stages of starvation, had no appetite for food. We do not always want what we most need.

Some church folk "do not care for a religious paper." This state of mind may be but a symptom of the greater need.

A church paper, at first taken from a sense of duty, would eventually interest the reader in the things in which he has most need to be interested.

You will be interested in the story of what our graduates are doing. Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D. D., President, Dubuque, Ia.

According to Dr. Franklin E. Hoskins

Moslems are buying Bibles

in large quantities. Dr. Hoskins is head of the Beirut Mission Press, which has disposed of more religious literature in the last five years than in the previous fifty years. Most of the Bibles recently sold have been to Moslems, who, he says, are reading widely since the constitutional era. He tells many interesting facts of recent developments in Syria in an interview with William T. Ellis which will appear next week. He shows how victories over the Turks in the recent war have aided in opening many opportunities to missionaries. Miss McDowell in "A Red Hat and a Question" in the same issue will stimulate thought on a pressing problem. Around the Shop

Occasionally the Around-the-Snop Man has to make confession, and this is one of the occasions. He has a soft spot in his heart for three classes of readers—very old folk, veterans of the civil war, and the boys and girls who read Young America. The number of Presbyterians who have taken The Continent and its predecessor for thirty years—many of them from the beginning forty years ago—is remarkable. Not infrequently one of the "old guard" calls at one of the offices, and he finds the staff appreciative of the honor. But the little folks, alas! cannot thus favor us.

Everyone on the staff would be pleased, for example, to meet Helen Baker, the young lady who wrote the following straightforward note:

"Here is my story about the little girl and the rabbits. I am not sure it is so good, but anyhow I did it all by myself. I am a little girl 10 years old and love to read The Continent each week."

The Around-the-Shop Man is going to be immensely flattered if he discovers that Helen reads his little cross section contribution to the paper!

We have violated etiquette in letting little folks speak before their elders. So to make up we'll let two who are older than Helen close the session. This from Illinois:

"I am an old lady past eighty. I taught school almost forty years. Four years I taught the freedmen in Florida and never had more earnest workers. Now about The Continent: I am delighted with every number and send them to my friends as an advertisement. With thanks and best wishes from your old friend."

And this from Iowa:

"I have had your paper for so many years I cannot count my reading matter complete without it. It is next my Bible and sure to give and leave peace and a way out of trouble."

A religious newspaper should be as nearly as possible like the religion it represents.

That leaves small room for pettiness, bickering and name-calling.

The enlarging kingdom needs to be represented by large-minded, sweet, sane, strong and spiritual publications. The business of the Master is too great and engrossing to permit either inclination or time for mean and ignoble criticisms of fellow Christians.

The Failure of Success

NOTHING FAILS LIKE SUCCESS.

Here is something to match against the favorite old proverb that everybody likes to quote: "Nothing succeeds like success."

It is not simply the amusement of seeing things turned topsy-turvy which prompts the reflective mind sometimes to reverse common sayings afloat in the speech of the people. Rather it is the feeling that what everybody says over so glibly without thinking needs to be tried out occasionally to see whether after all it is as true as people take for granted.

Usually, when turned inside out, proverbs are not found by any means empty of truth. But they are hardly ever found big enough to contain all the truth.

And that is what one realizes when the accepted notion of the success of success is put to scrutiny. The success of success is true, but not so entirely true as most imagine. The failure of success is also a truth, and at least equally sizable and significant.

"Nothing succeeds like success" is the proverbial way of predicting that the man who is succeeding will go on to succeed further.

But for the warning of the man who is succeeding and the encouragement of the man who has not succeeded yet, it is wholesome to point out that many a man's success is precisely what keeps him from going on to greater successes.

Thousands on thousands of people who seem very enviable in the station they have reached in life are stopped and even paralyzed there because they dare not risk a bigger deed for fear of losing the success they have already attained.

This is true in some degree of financial success. Many a man whose enterprise was bold and achieving in his younger days when he had nothing to lose, is accomplishing little in his years of greater experience and strength, simply because he is now afraid to risk the capital he has accumulated. He has succeeded so well that now he cannot afford to lose. So he will never do anything bigger than he has done.

But if the paralysis of financial enterprise were the only sort of failure resulting from big success, that would not be of enough consequence to revise a proverb for. It is in spiritual things that limitations resulting from success really grow serious.

In the church and in related lines of social service one can find everywhere excellent men who are indeed doing good in the world, but not nearly so much good as their native capacities make them capable of nor the good which their first enthusiastic service in active life promised. And the reason for their falling short, when you come to look into it, is very plain.

The trouble is not, as usually assumed, that these men have lost in maturity the fire and force of youth, but simply that they are now well thought of and comfortable in what they are doing, and they dread losing prestige or prosperity if they should try something new.

So the successful man keeps on doing the old thing in which he has won reputation and a livelihood—the thing he knows he can do because he has done it.

Yet all the while some other better thing is calling to him—knocking at the door of his heart and conscience—and it is a fine, brave, noble, inspiring thing which he right well knows that somebody ought to do. Yet he won't try it; he might "lose out."

Still in the depths of his soul he knows that if it was not for jeopardizing what he has already gained—if he was out on the ground and had to start new in life—he would be plunging into that greater service like a crusader.

It is nothing but his success which holds him back.

This is a condition by no means peculiar to the ministry of the church. It works everywhere. But just because the ministry is the one calling where the summons to service should be strongest, it is plainer to see in that vocation than anywhere else how success "doth make cowards of us all." Hence it is not invidious to turn there for illustration.

A young man graduates from his theological preparation all full of a chivalric purpose to consecrate himself absolutely. He resolves that he is going to go where men are needing Christ worst.

A call soon comes to a comfortable church. It is not the comfort, though, that allures him just then. He sees need there, and without question he accepts the call. He begins to preach the gospel with all the fervor of his soul. He has mighty joy in feeling the tides of its power flow through him.

Soon it is said among those who know him that the young minister is a very effective Christian leader. Some larger church hears of his good repute and calls him into a more prominent field. There his reputation for strength and efficiency enlarges, and ere long the gossip of ecclesiastical circles is that he is highly successful.

All the while his personal and domestic comfort increases. His family is growing up around him in a pleasant home. All the delights of life surround him.

And then of a sudden is thrust into his face the vast need of some field almost bereft of the gospel—some place where the healing power of the Christ he preaches is needed far more than in the well evangelized parish where he is established.

But this needier field, of course, is a poor and forsaken field. It can't pay anything like the salary which the minister is already receiving. It has no such advantages for his wife and children as the place where he is now living. And if he went there his name would not be on the lips of the public as it is now.

In fact, if he should go there, people would be astounded to see him "step down in the world." They would whisper that he had begun to fail.

If he were not a success already, he would be quick to go to that empty and hungry parish and give it all himself. He knows very well that he would accomplish far greater things spiritually there than where he is.

But being a success he doesn't dare to go down and try it.

Being a success has paralyzed him.

No, to be sure, no man can ask the Lord to prevent his being a success in order to save him from being a coward. The Lord could not do very much in his ministry or elsewhere with a man who prayed not to be a success.

But though psychology is against it, it is possible for the Lord's grace to prevent a man's being a coward even though he is a success.

And in the day of accounts, let us remember, success will be otherwise estimated.

Bulgaria Battles Against Other Balkan States

A chorus of condemnation has gone up from the American press anent the present war in the Balkan peninsula. Bulgaria after some initial successes is reported to have suffered severe reverses at the hands of the various armies representing Servia, Greece, Montenegro and Roumania. The last named cast in her lot with the other Balkan states against her belligerent neighbor, being moved to this course in part by Bulgaria's refusal to give up a slice of territory on the Black sea as compensation for Roumania's neutrality during the recent war with Turkey. The members of the new four-cornered alliance blame Bulgaria, and Bulgaria in turn blames its former friends and present foes for forcing the fight. However, correspondents of the London newspapers assert that the Bulgarian forward movement which precipitated hostilities was ordered by the Bulgarian General Savoff without the knowledge of King Ferdinand or Premier Daneff. The correspondents further charge the Bulgarians with committing atrocities such as the wholesale burning of villages and the murdering of their male and female inhabitants. The New York Tribune calls it "war at its worst."

Last Saturday the Turkish army marched to Adrianople, with orders to occupy territory now protected by Bulgarians, and it is asserted that the Turkish government has received assurances from Servia, Greece and Roumania that they will not conclude an armistice without consulting the porte. King Constantine of Greece has made a protest to the civilized world against the atrocities reported to have been committed by the Bulgarian troops accompanied with the expressed intention that his country expects to exact vengeance for all outrages committed in Greek territory. Meanwhile reports have come from Sofia that there has been serious rioting, suggesting the possibility of violent opposition to the Bulgarian government.

As previously pointed out, Austria-Hungary and, to a lesser extent, Russia were responsible for bringing on the war because of their unwillingness to let the victors reap the legitimate rewards of their struggles and sacrifices against the Turk. The Toronto Globe calls Austria the "agent provacateur" of the conflict. Austria's first object was to block the Slavic advance to the west and south, which it achieved by the cry of "Albania for the Albanians" and insisting that the boundaries of the new Albanian state be extensive, thus cutting away the gains of Servia and Greece. Italian jealousy of Greek glory was played upon, and dissension was also sown among the allies. As soon as Russia stepped in and demanded peace Austria is said to have insisted that the little nations be left free to fight each other, with the result of repeating a chapter from the warfare of the dark ages.

New Tariff Bill Will Probably Pass the Senate

Soon after the Fourth of July holidays the Democratic senators held a caucus at Washington on the pending tariff bill and forty-seven of them pledged themselves to vote for the measure. Two senators, Messrs. Thornton and Ransdell of Louisiana, were the only Democrats who refused to support the bill, their refusal being based on their objection to placing sugar on the free list. Two absentee senators will support the bill, which therefore appears assured of forty-nine votes, with the vote of the vice-president to fall back on in an emergency—a slender majority, but sufficient to pass the measure. In its essential features the senate caucus bill does not differ from the Underwood bill approved by the President, as the changes made by the finance committee under Senator Simmons were not radical.

If the bill becomes law wool is to go on the free list next January; meats and cattle will be free; on March 1 the duty on sugar will be reduced and later be removed entirely; wheat and flour will be free, with a provision for countervailing duties applying to countries which tax American imports. The Democratic desire for haste in putting the bill through is expected to meet Republican obstruction, and it is now said that the bill will probably not be finally acted upon until September.

Railways Involved in More Labor Trouble

The present week opened with the prospect that nearly 80,000 conductors and trainmen employed by forty-five railways operating in the eastern part of the United States would soon refuse to work, the Brotherhood of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen having voted to strike on word from their presidents. Monday afternoon at a conference with President Wilson threatened hostilities were suspended and all parties agreed to a new law to be passed by Congress this week supplanting the Erdman act by a measure which provides for a United States board of conciliation and mediation of three members, the chairman of which shall be appointed by the President for a term of seven years. The other two shall be officials of the government designated for this duty. A board of arbitration consisting of six is also provided. The railway employees are asking for an increase in wages which the railway managers say will amount to $17,000,000 a year. It is asserted that western conductors receive $4.18 a day and conductors in the South $4.10, as against $3.63 for conductors in the East. A similar difference exists in the wages of trainmen. Chairman Lee of the conference committee of railway managers says, however, that argument based on this comparison is fallacious because the higher rates were received through coercion.

The New York Tribune editorially calls attention to the fact that railway men lately have readily voted in favor of a strike, as past experience has taught them that the threat to leave their work brings about arbitration which results in a compromise so that the men have nothing to lose. This paper further suggests that there is ample room for abuse of this arbitration principle.

Charities Conference Considers Country Life

The National Conference of Charities and Correction went to Seattle for its annual meeting place this year, and took its president from Chicago in the person of Professor Graham Taylor, head of the Chicago Commons and connected with the Chicago Theological Seminary. Dr. A. J. McKelway of Atlanta and John M. Glenn of New York were elected first and second vice-presidents.

The conference gave more than usual attention to the question of the betterment of rural conditions, which it was admitted depends largely upon the improvement of schools and churches. Dr. W. H. Slingerland, a special agent of the Russell Sage Foundation, appears to have gone to the heart of the problem with a suggestion that these agencies, in order to increase their efficiency, should be nationalized. He argued for more and better country teachers, schoolhouses and playgrounds, and a well developed system of social centers. These are needs which are now recognized in the cities, but their urgency in rural communities is not always recognized. Dr. Slingerland also laid emphasis on the revitalizing and modernizing of the country church.

Irish Home Rule Again Passes the Commons

The house of commons last week passed the Irish home rule bill on its third reading on its second journey to the house of lords in the face of predictions of disaster by Bonar Law, leader of the opposition. Premier Asquith scouted these threats of war and rebellion, and the government's majority was 109 votes.

Sir Gilbert Parker, the well-known author and member of parliament, writing The London Times after a journey to Ireland and through Ulster, declared that it is "mere madness" to believe that nothing will happen if this home rule bill receives the signature of the king. Sir Gilbert says he found a dynamic force in Ulster unionism, and that the Nationalists believe Ulster will fight.

Another one of the Liberal government's measures—the Welsh Church disestablishment bill—passed its third reading last week by practically the same majority as that given the home rule bill.

Moral and Physical Health of Children Discussed

Teachers of the United States, organized into the National Educational Association, have just held an important convention at Salt Lake City. A large number of vital subjects were discussed and the papers and addresses will later be published in a volume which is sent to members of the association. President Edward T. Fairchild in his annual address recommended a radical reorganization of the association through the selection of an executive council which should serve for a term of years and thus give continuity of action.

President Baker of the University of Colorado presented a report on the economy of time in education in which he declared that school and college courses were too long and should be shortened so that a student might graduate from any nontechnical college by the time he was 20. The committee on health problems charged that more attention is given to the health of cattle than to children, which bold assertion naturally challenged attention. The indictment was presented by Dr. Thomas D. Wood of Columbia University and Dr. R. B. Corwin of the University of Colorado, and attacked not only the sanitation of schools but surrounding conditions. This investigation into the neglect of the moral and physical health of school children is to be pursued further.

The board of directors of the organization decided immediately to begin a campaign to raise a million dollar fund by popular subscription to be applied to increase the scope of the association's work and in the erection of a building at the national capital. Dr. Joseph Swain, president of Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania, was elected president of the association.

Advance Broad Regulation Principle

Government regulation of the railway systems of the country was given a decided impetus by the recent report of the investigation which the interstate commerce commission has been making during the last year into the affairs of the New York, New Haven and Hartford, the Boston and Maine, and the Maine Central. No order was issued by the commission, but it expressed the opinion that no interstate railroad should expend money or acquire property for purposes other than the operation of its road or in its development. No road should be permitted to lease or purchase any other railroad nor acquire the stocks or securities of any other railroad without the approval of the federal government. In the same way the commission believes that no interstate road should be permitted to issue stocks or bonds without the approval of the government. These conclusions are arrived at after a careful analysis of the financial management of the New Haven road, in which it is shown that if the company had confined itself to actual railroad activities it could have paid a dividend of 8 per cent last year and could have shown a large surplus account instead of a deficit of $930,000. The commission also says that the New Haven's agreement with the Boston and Albany is violative of the spirit of the statute against restraint of competition. The recommendations made by this federal body have already been adopted in large part by a number of states.

—The Australian commonwealth has recently witnessed a change of administration owing to the fact that the labor party, which had been in power since 1910, was defeated by the Liberals at the recent closely contested general election. Sir Andrew Fisher resigned as premier and is succeeded by Joseph Hume Cook, the leader of the Liberal party in the federal parliament.

—That grand old leader among Presbyterian educational institutions, Washington and Jefferson College, has just completed an endowment fund of $400,000. More than that, when the campaign closed President Moffat and his trustees found themselves in possession of pledges that brought the total $41,000 above the amount sought. Those who know Dr. Moffat and the institution he heads need no special evidence that Washington and Jefferson is not living on its past but is fully alive to the present and future; yet they cannot fail to be moved to delightful surprise by such an exceptional achievement as this.

Religious World

Encouraging News of Christian Endeavor

It was reported at the opening of the international convention of Christian Endeavor at Los Angeles July 9 that a total of 1,089 young people had reached the standard prescribed by the leaders of the United Society for Christian Endeavor experts. During the last two years the societies have been following the watchword of efficiency given at the Atlantic City convention two years ago by President Francis E. Clark, founder of the movement. An elaborate system of marking for the attainment of excellence in various lines of work for individuals, societies and unions was outlined and the young people have made earnest efforts to attain the standards set. Just as efficiency was the watchword for the last two years, increase of societies and members was zealously sought after during the preceding two years. "Father" Clark in his annual address at Los Angeles combined these two watchwords and asked that for the two years to come the Endeavor host work for "increase and efficiency." He also suggested that there be set apart by the Christian Endeavor societies the week in which the 2d of February occurs, to be known as "increase and efficiency week." This date is the anniversary of the founding of the first society thirty-three years ago and it was his suggestion that during this week special meetings be held, when the young people shall take stock of their activities to see whether or not they are living up to their ideals and progressing to new and larger endeavors.

The report of William Shaw, secretary of the United Society, gave examples of a large list of practical works in which the various societies of the churches are engaged. From the history of a typical society, Fourth Congregational church of Hartford, Connecticut, he showed that although during its twenty-five years it has at no time numbered 10 per cent of the church membership, yet it has furnished over 60 per cent of the volunteer leaders and workers of that church. He reported that there were over 29,000 young people enrolled in the Tenth Legion (tithers), and that nearly 73,000 Christian Endeavorers as Comrades of the Quiet Hour devote regularly a stated portion of each day to meditation.

Koreans Awaiting Verdict in Last Trial

The trial before the Tai Ku court of appeals of the six Koreans still charged with attempted assassination of Governor General Terauchi was concluded Saturday. In their closing plea the counsel for the defense argued for acquittal, asserting that the accusations against the defendants were groundless. Perhaps, the counsel said, all the defendants were not tortured, but undoubtedly the police concocted false charges and in some way forced the prisoners to make statements supporting these false accusations. Judgment was deferred, and the board at New York is awaiting a cable.

Pan-Presbyterian Council Echoes

BY W. I. WISHART

THE Alliance of the Reformed Churches in its quadrennial council is not a legislative body, but its meetings are significant and important. In this Aberdeen council a score of the great Presbyterian bodies of the world are represented; among the delegates are some of the strongest and most brainy men of these churches, and they have been dealing with big, important, vital themes, and though the council wields no authority, it means something for these religious leaders to come together in a happy fellowship, to declare their convictions on matters closely related to the welfare of the kingdom of God, and to discuss the best methods of promoting that kingdom.

The opening session of the council was held in old St. Machar's church, a one time Catholic cathedral. The St. Machar who built the original church on this site seems to have been a disciple of that Christian pioneer in Britain, Columba. His church building is gone, but the present church, built on the same site, dates back, in part at least, to 1357. Of course it was a Roman Catholic structure, but it was sterilized by means of sundry Protestant raids of a highly iconoclastic character. The pictures and images were destroyed; the figures of Jesus and the Virgin were chiseled out; Cromwell's soldiers pulled the stones from under the tower with which to build their defenses, and the tower fell down, crushing a large part of the nave. In this historic structure the council met very comfortably, although the quaint wooden ceiling above them still bears the heraldic shields of sundry popes and bishops, as well as ancient kings and Jacobean earls.

The opening sermon, by George Adam Smith, D. D., LL. D., principal of Aberdeen University, began with a happy welcome to the council. Dr. Smith discussed at some length the genius of Presbyterianism and described it as "a system for free people that love a regulated and self-regulating freedom; for a people independent, yet patient, considerate, trusting much to the processes of discussion and consultation and more to the promise of a much forgiving and a watchful Lord. It is a system for strong churches, churches that are not afraid to let their members see the light of day, to let their weakest parts and worst defects be canvassed before all men, that they may be mended."

The opening address of the council by its president, Dr. David James Burrell, was a ringing, positive message, that pronounced

Getting the Second Wind

PROFESSOR WILLIAM JAMES first put into words the interesting fact which many of us have experienced. It is that in great physical effort there is a very early stage when one seems exhausted and unable to go on. If then by sheer force of will one does go on, there comes a new reenforcement of strength, the weariness and exhaustion pass away, and the following period of endurance is longer than the first one. That may even be repeated with some men two or three times. Professor James suggests that there may be reserves of strength, reservoirs of physical power, which we tap from time to time as we go on. It is an interesting fact. Most men who have undertaken any physical exercise understand it. A runner knows it very well. Anyone who watches by a sick bed realizes how the early part of the night is often more exhausting than the latter part. Carrying a heavy load reveals the same conditions.

This which Professor James works out on a physical basis is good for all parts of life and work. There is a first flush of strength and success, when everything is promising, and then there comes an exhaustion which is often the time of despair for the worker. If, however, by force of will, or by assurance of God's desire, the worker holds on, there comes a revival of strength, and often a much longer period of great blessing.

It is certainly so in most forms of Christian work. Ministers will agree that the second, or at most the third, year of a pastorate is the really critical year. This depends partly on the size of the church. It comes earlier in a small church, and later in a large one. Ordinarily, by the end of a second year of a pastorate the new is worn off of both pastor and people. The first enthusiasm is necessarily gone. Expectations which were high in certain lines, when the new minister came, are proved to be probably mistaken. He was going to be a great children's worker; it now looks as though he would not be. He was going to be a very popular preacher and call in large congregations; it now seems clear that this is not his special power.

The minister feels the same thing about the church. Everybody was trying to be especially kind and nice during the first year. He has become rather a matter of course with his people afterwards, and they do not think it necessary to show him constantly the little attentions which made the first year so very pleasant. Then comes the sag. The first wind is exhausted. The minister thinks it likely he has made a mistake. He believes that someone else could probably do better in that field, and wonders whether for the sake of the field itself he had not better withdraw. There comes a passing notion of the same sort to the church. There is nothing mysterious about it at all. It is as natural as anything can be. But it is just the time for pastor and people to hold steady, to go on in definite expectation that after a while the second wind will come.

Ask any pastor who has served a long time in a pastorate whether he does not know what that feeling is, and whether after it he has not done his best work. The second wind is the best after all. Often there comes a third, and a fourth, for these sags in ministerial life are recurrent. But if by sheer effort of will, and by a sense of God's desire, a man will hold himself to his work, ceasing to look elsewhere or think elsewhere, he may have full faith in a new reservoir of strength which he will tap, whose current will be stronger and whose water will be more refreshing than that which he first found.

It is not peculiar to ministers. Sunday school teachers know all about it. Some of them have given up at the end of the first wind. They have felt sure that they were failures. All who have succeeded, however, have in their history this sag time, when they were conscious of being failures. At that time they held on, determined by God's grace to find some way out, and God has given them their second wind and success. Business men know about it in their own lines. Young fellows who have taken positions, and have been so sure that they had found just their place, have also in a few months been ready to accept something else, when, if they had waited to catch breath again, they would have found themselves ready to go on for years to larger success.

For that matter, this is a common experience of the Christian life itself. The losses after revival meetings are outstanding illustrations of it. These converts were runners who struck a rapid pace at the first, and did not know enough to keep moving when their breath seemed gone, in the assurance that there was a second wind awaiting them for the long run. Most of us have had experiences that now rather amuse us, when we thought we would have to give up the Christian life. We were dismal failures in it and might as well end it first as last. Then appeared some friend, or some family training asserted itself, and we held on more as a matter of form than anything else. It did not seem quite decent to give up. So we pegged away at our Christian duty. Presently our second wind came. We tapped a new reservoir of strength, and we have gone on ever since. When a man is sure he is in the way that God wants him to go, he can afford to keep going in the assurance that at every point in the road God has new supplies awaiting him.

Not So Simple, but All Right Nevertheless

Of the suggestion which emerged at the last Southern General Assembly for a federal union of all Presbyterian and Reformed churches under a national congress of two houses the first remark of the casual listener doubtless will be: "But surely there are a hundred simpler ways than that for getting done the thing you are after—the combination of a group of closely related churches." And nobody will deny the truth of that. But this happens to be one place where simplicity is not exactly the first desideratum.

The situation is similar in substance to the situation of the colonies before the federal government of the United States was formed. Everybody then knew that a consolidation of the colonies was necessary, but nearly everybody was afraid, if consolidation should be absolutely complete, that the factor in the union for which he personally cared most—his own colony—was going to disappear. Therefore they planned finally a union which combined all but obliterated none. And history says today of the fathers who met a simple situation with a complicated scheme that they did wisely. And the scheme has turned out not to be so complicated as it looked.

The attitude of the different elements of the Presbyterian family of churches today is, of course, not an exact parallel to all this; but there is a side-by-side identity on the one point of wanting the union and dreading the peril of getting too much of it. And it is that which has put it into the fertile brain of Dr. Campbell of Asheville to apply the same sort of adjustment in this case which worked so well in politics when the pioneer patriots of the country devised it. For the church, too, he proposes a legislature of two houses. In one of these the people shall be represented according to numbers and populations; in the other the combining units shall be represented equally without regard to their numerical size. In this way the lesser bodies will be protected against the horrible-to-mention fate of being "swallowed up," and yet they will have the joys and blessing of a very real union—that is to say, they will have the said blessings in case they are genuinely willing to make the union as real as the fathers of the nation made the union of the states.

The Continent for its part would speak out for a simple plan if it consulted its own inclinations solely. From our viewpoint the way to unite is to say, "Let us all be one," and then go and be it with no more ado. But union Presbyterians simply must have, and if some of the friends are too timid to take it the simple way, then The Continent is for having it any way that those most concerned are prepared to have it—always provided, as remarked heretofore, it is union and not a perpetuation and sanction for division under a disguise. Being satisfied that this plan from Dr. Campbell is a real union plan, The Continent regards it with lively favor. The only thing needful to insist upon is that the federal congress in contemplation must have some actual power. Without power the new agency would be no gain over the existing Presbyterian Federal Council, which is everything needful as long as consultation only is in view. And if a constitution is written out for a federal congress with power, it should be written in a fashion so elastic as to permit the constant increase of the authority of the uniting body, as year by year the denominations associated in it come to know and trust one another better.

How University Work Prospers in Indiana

In Indiana also the ministry to Presbyterian students in state universities verifies and vindicates itself when done in a big spirit of virility and faith. Thomas R. White, who went to Bloomington as pastor of the local church and was dragged out of that task into the university pastorate by the compelling opportunities he saw among the students, has now brought his work along to the place where he and his committee are convinced that a student center is necessary.

Circumstances there do not call for a university church such as was required at the University of Illinois, for in Bloomington the local congregation has its church home within a stone's throw of the university campus and is most hospitable in welcoming students there. But a building for student meetings and social student fellowship is important, and by way of providing for it, Mr. White has optioned the only eligible lot in town at the corner of Kirkwood and Indiana avenues. This adjoins the campus, directly opposite the university library in one direction and opposite the student house of the Disciples in the other. Diagonally across the street intersection is the site chosen for the university's new administration building. The Presbyterian lot—or rather the lot which it is proposed to make Presbyterian—has now two old buildings of which helpful use can be made pending the erection of a structure specially designed for the purpose in view. That part of the plan can wait a while, but what Mr. White has loaded on his own shoulders as immediately necessary is the obtaining of $14,000 to take up the lot option before it expires on August 31. It may cost the doughty university pastor some pains and sweat to get it done, but, of course, he will do it, for it is not written that Indiana ever yet fell down on a proposition so clearly approved by that authoritative firm of joint experts—Opportunity and Duty.

Greeley Plan Would Work Elsewhere

The Continent is indebted to the friend from Colorado who in our columns has directed attention to the plan of the Colorado State Teachers' Training College in Greeley for linking up Sunday school Bible study with the course of instruction in the college. Further literature shows that in eight different churches of Greeley 133 students were at one time pursuing this Bible course Sunday after Sunday, stimulated not alone by the interest of the study but by the knowledge that the normal school would allow them credit toward graduation for their work. The same institution is this summer giving two elective courses in religious and moral education during the summer term, which are likewise taken account of for graduation credits. In this way a fund of Bible knowledge and an impression of the importance of moral training are being added to the equipment of the future public school teachers of the commonwealth. Colorado could not possibly accumulate a more valuable civic asset than that.

Besides this gratifying influence, the experiment at Greeley sets a highly important example which may be imitated in other localities where state educational institutions are located, with the certainty of establishing a new and valuable link between the churches and the students. The Continent judges that there are practically no normal schools in the country, and few state universities, that would not be willing to work out some such plan of cooperation with the local churches if they were sure of competent teaching in the churches' Bible schools.

—The "vocation day" that Secretary Cochran of the Board of Education at Philadelphia invented a year or so ago for Presbyterians has been officially appropriated by the Southern Methodist Church, which has put it into its denominational Sunday school calendar. On the last Sunday in September all the million Sunday school children of that connection will be told how they are bound to choose for their livelihood in the world only such occupations as are fit to serve God in, and that God will hold them each responsible for making the right kind of choice. And, of course, there will be a good deal said about the ministry and missionary service as preeminently appealing. Among Presbyterians, although it is understood that any pastor or any congregation or any school is free to observe "vocation day" whenever the impulse moves, the late Assembly suggested some time in the week of February 1 to 8 as appropriate, since that is to be called educational week.

—The usefulness of muscular Christianity as an adjunct to Christianity of the spirit is illustrated by the true story from Oklahoma which tells how a cowboy invaded a church where an athletic young Presbyterian home missionary was preaching and began to shoot up the place. The preacher grabbed a heavy poker from beside the church stove, leaped over two seats and with a well directed blow laid the cowboy out senseless. Then he applied cold water liberally to bring the intruder back to consciousness, talked "Dutch uncle" fashion to him, prayed with him and at length got the fellow converted. For several years now that rampageous cowboy has been an earnest and useful Christian worker.

—In his recent visit to Australia Fred B. Smith was going over ground which he had traversed in an evangelistic tour eight years before. Naturally he and his companions looked to see whether his work had "stuck," and they found it had. In the city of Sydney alone seven men are now in the ministry who were converted under Fred Smith's preaching in 1905.

—The allegations of "drunken orgies" attending Princeton commencement printed in The New Republic of June 27 are a distorted exaggeration of some incidents which the authorities and representative alumni of Princeton University have deeply deplored in past years, and which responsible Princetonians have worked hard and quite successfully to eliminate. "Drunken orgies" is a phrase never justified at the very worst, and The New Republic's correspondent bases most of his accusations on conditions observed before President Wilson's administration five years ago took hold of the question and determined that grounds of such complaint must be eliminated. The New Republic by no means gives the university credit of improvements effected since then. The Continent feels, indeed, that Princeton has not yet gone as far as it should go. In a community where university interests are as omnipotent as they are in Princeton, the faculty and trustees can secure the cancellation of all liquor licenses in the town whenever they choose to insist upon it; and we hope they will soon be convinced that they ought so to insist. But we are glad to observe that even by Mr. Kelley—the author of the New Republic article—it is acknowledged that no faculty member in these days signs liquor petitions.

—There are some people who think that The Continent is too vehement against the liquor business, but The Continent has at least one subscriber who thinks that it is not aggressive enough. The reason of this difference of judgment is plain—the people who would have the subject touched more lightly are those who never felt the liquor serpent's sting. This pastor who adjures us to be more intense speaks from bitter memories that have scarred his soul. When he was but a boy his mother died from his father's abuse and cruelty when drunk, and of the father's fate he knows nothing whatever. No wonder that this man writes: "Words are wholly inadequate to portray the desolation and ruin caused by drink, and the sufferers cry out, 'Oh, Lord, how long!'" It is easy to be calm over such a curse if the point of the barbed arrow has never come home to one's own heart.

—Americans are always interested in the thing that never happened before. There was one such feature unmistakably in the recent gathering of the World's Christian Student Federation at Lake Mohonk—the presence there of a Greek Catholic bishop commissioned by the patriarch of Constantinople to attend this conference and discover all that he could there concerning means and methods for heightening the religious and moral welfare of students. Never before has the Orthodox Greek Church condescended to seek religious advice from Protestants. There were a number of other private members of the Greek Church in attendance from Russia, Bulgaria and Greece, but this Constantinople guest was an ordained prelate officially commissioned by the head of his own "holy synod."

—Professor Fagnani of Union Seminary is a radical of radicals in religion and in politics both, and he is thought much too extreme for a theological professor even by some folks who are thought quite a little radical themselves. But World's Work has an interesting note of how Professor Fagnani's Bible class in the West Side Christian Association in New York City redeemed a saloonkeeper and made him over into an earnest Christian man. That is a trophy that not every orthodox preacher can be credited with. There is something good in any theology capable of such results.

—It is surely a risky business to be revising and amplifying Scripture, but Dr. J. F. Hinkhouse, who is doing a remarkable piece of country church resuscitation with the Cross Lanes congregation in Iowa, seems to have expanded Scripture unheretically and very forcibly when he gives out to his people the following watchword: "'Come thou with us and we will do thee good' is a fine proposition. A better one is: Come thou with us and we will do each other good. But better still is this: Come thou with us and together we will do good to others."

—The "white ribbon women" of the world are coming to the United States this autumn. The world's convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union meets in Brooklyn the last week in October.

Around Sinai with an American Missionary

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

"FROM THE NILE TO NEBO," BY FRANKLIN E. HOSKINS. Two classes of persons should read this book—first, the fortunate few who may travel from Egypt to Sinai and up through the Holy Land; and, second, those who stay at home. For this book is as near to an actual journey over a most absorbing region as most of us can come.

The flavor of the open road is in these pages. Dr. Hoskins writes with the certitude of the man who has seen with his own eyes, and knows whereof he speaks. He is quick to catch the meaning of the flutter of the dying quail in the hands of a cameleer who has seized the bird at the very place where the children of Israel grumbled at too much quail. Like a veteran of the desert, he translates the irrefutable testimony of the still flowing springs to the reliability of the Exodus story. The relation of the turquoise mines of Sinai, with their inscriptions (what a story for a class of boys!), to the chronology and the route of the Exodus is made luminous; while a lifetime of study of Arabia makes it easy for this author to prove that, instead of blazing a new road through the wilderness, the children of Israel followed one of the immemorial caravan routes which are interwoven through Palestine and Arabia like golden threads of romance.

Settling the Route of the Exodus]

The spirit of the book breathes through this quotation:

"Why men and students should go roaming through every conceivable hypothesis and theory, sitting thousands of miles away in space, and 2,000 or 3,000 years away in time, in order to upset and overturn this record of the route, when a single journey through that country, with intelligent observation, should settle the problem forever, is more than I can understand. . . .

"The absence or presence of water, and these eight facts—the land of Goshen, the identification of the starting point at Pithom and Raamses, the stretch of desert, the arm or arms of the sea where the winds still battle with the troubled waters, the waterless stretch of three days' journey, the well and palm trees at what must be Elim, another camp by the shore of the sea and then the journey upward into the granite mountains—are facts that cannot be argued or explained away or disposed of by theories, and which looked at fairly must fix forever the absolute identification of this first section of the route and the traditional location of Sinai within the peninsula. The route fits the documents as the key fits the lock, and the documents will not fit any other route that has ever been explored or suggested."

How Numerous Were the Children of Israel?

One of the greatest perplexities that will confront students of the Exodus Sunday school lessons concerns the numbers of the children of Israel who were led out of Egypt. Three million is the commonly accepted figure. But it has been shown that Pithom and Raamses, in fact, all Goshen itself, could not hold so many people; nor could the Sinai peninsula support them, owing to limitations of the water supply. If the Hebrew army was as large as the traditional figures represent, the account of the battle of Rephidim, when the natives could have mustered at most but a few hundred warriors, becomes almost a caricature. Nor could Egypt have suffered the loss of such a host—well nigh half the land's population, which was but 7,000,000 in the days of the Roman empire, and is only 11,000,000 now—without a record of the tremendous event appearing often on the monuments. Even the promised land, which contained but a million persons in the prosperous days of Israel (which meant a population as dense as that of Denmark or Scotland, 150 persons to the square mile), could not have supported the 3,000,000 exiles.

All these, and other perplexities, are brilliantly treated by Dr. Hoskins in his chapter on "The Numbers of the Children of Israel." He helps even the layman to see that the entire inverted pyramid of problems is poised on the point of a single word, which has two meanings in Hebrew and in the cognate Semitic languages, but which is given only one in the Hexateuch translations. This word is "alaf," commonly rendered "thousands," whereas it also means, and quite as frequently, "families" or "clans." Thus, "six hundred thousands" of fighting men become "six hundred families" of fighting men. By this line of reasoning, and a careful examination of the passages concerned, it is made clear that instead of 3,000,000 exiles, there were only about a hundred thousand—a figure which clarifies the whole problem of the Exodus, the wandering and the subsequent settlement of Canaan. The reviewer can imagine that many Sunday school teachers will find Dr. Hoskins's book a "lesson help" indeed.

Some Illuminating Lighter Touches

The lighter touch of the traveler is as natural to Dr. Hoskins's pen as the weightier matters of archæology. We enjoy the fracas with the foiled sheik and the scheming officials of Akaba as genuinely as we enjoy following the clear trail blazed through Exodus chronology. The illuminating glimpses into Arab life; the apt native proverbs; the usages of tent life; the occasional revealing glimpse of present world politics; the descriptions of scenery and the wealth of extraordinary photographs are treasures that one scarcely expects to find in a book which makes a scholarly contribution to the great story of Hebrew emancipation. The chapter on the mysterious rock city fastness of Petra, through whose narrow sik flowed the tides of Egyptian, Grecian, Roman, Arabian and possibly Hebrew civilization, is alone sufficient to make the volume a library treasure.

All Presbyterians know the author, Franklin E. Hoskins, D. D., as a leader of the Syria mission, head of the mission press, creator of the Arabic reference Bible; preacher, traveler, author and missionary statesman. Dr. Hoskins knows the Bible land as few living men. He has stood on every peak in Palestine, from Mount Hermon to Mount Hor. He speaks the language like a native, and knows the etiquette of life amid the Arabs. He has the happy faculty of ministering at once to the reader's interest in the present as well as the past—thus, he tells us of the Suez canal, as well as of the monastery on Sinai, and the "high places" at Petra. He lets us into the inwardness of the Turkish government's ways today, as well as of those of the Pharaohs of the time of Moses. A more comprehensive book upon a given theme has rarely come from the press.

It is gratifying that this well nigh indispensable book for the up-to-date Sunday school teacher, now that the international cycle of lessons has carried us to the Exodus, should be the work of one of our own household, whose scholarship, piety and unique equipment for this difficult task are known to all informed Presbyterians. Western Education in Tibet

BY FRANKLIN D. COGSWELL

"FOUR YOUNG MEN, sons of high Tibetan officials, and some Tibetan lads from Darjeeling have sailed from Bombay to England in charge of a British trade agent for education at the government's expense. Their ages are from 10 to 20, and they will stay in England for about ten years, studying the language, handicrafts and laws." Such is the information recently published in a newspaper in Allahabad, India.

Several months ago we read that another group had been sent from Tibet to Russia for the same purpose.

At different times in the last two decades the world has been thrilled by the reports of intrepid explorers who have penetrated Tibet, that mysterious land of Central Asia which has so long resisted any intercourse with the outside world. Not since Sven Hedin braved death from starvation and treachery to bring back his fascinating account of that wind-swept plateau, "The Roof of the World," and not since the gallant Colonel Younghusband led into the capital of the lamas the expedition that gave the first shock to its proud title, "the Forbidden City," has Tibet been the same ancient secret. But with the exception of the few ignorant Tibetan traders who come down into North India and Burma and an occasional flight of the grand lama to Darjeeling or China, Tibet has learned nothing of the West by her own contact with western peoples. A few western travelers have been the means of giving Tibet a very slight knowledge of the outer world. Now that Tibet herself has broken down the old isolation and has sent a group of her own sons to study in western lands and be the pioneers of a new culture on their return it would seem that the future can have no barriers against the complete mingling of races.

The political status of Tibet is growing acute. The governors of the western provinces of China, Yunnan and Szechuan, taking advantage of the paralzyed condition of the central government in this unsettled transition period, have entered on a deliberate policy of expansion in Tibet, and reports of the fighting between their armed bands and the Tibetan tribes have been drifting down into India for months past. The same ambitious governors, moreover, defying an Anglo-Chinese agreement, which loosely defines the divide between the Salwin and the Irawadi as the border between Upper Burma and Western China, have sent troops into territory claimed by Great Britain, and the latter has recently dispatched a column from Burma to deal with the trespassers. Recent events have seemed to indicate that Great Britain is looking forward to an extension of her control into Tibet, and her vigorous action against Tibet's Chinese enemies is not likely to have the effect of retarding her advances to that end. In the meantime there is always present the old suspicion that Russia has intentions regarding Tibet; thus, when the two groups of students return, one educated in England, the other in Russia, they may face a complex political situation.

As for the religious and social significance of this first student migration from a hitherto closed land no uncertainty exists. If the young Tibetans are brought under the noble influences the West is able to give, if they learn to know the spirituality of the West, and not its materialism alone, there may be sent back into those Himalayan tablelands men fired with a passion to cleanse the iniquities which ignorance and corruption have laid upon their people —men who will lead them not only to a solution of their political difficulties but also to that righteousness which exalteth a nation.

A Visitor from Troubled Turkey

An Interview with Franklin E. Hoskins, D. D., of Beirut

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Editor Afield of The Continent

A GROUP of men had drifted together one September evening a few years ago in a Constantinople hotel. There was an American consul general, a veteran Turkish correspondent of a press association, a British teacher and an American missionary. The talk flowed in strange channels. It began with the lighter gossip about new second-hand warships and the personalities of the new regime. Thence it traveled to the nationalities and religions of conglomerate Turkey, and tarried over the mysteries of the Yezidis and Druses. It delved into some of the stories which are never printed concerning the Mecca pilgrimage, the relations of the powers thereto and other fascinating phases of "the great game" of international politics. The present writer was a listener, and he noted that the man of the four whose knowledge was completest on most of the subjects treated, and whose observations were most penetrating, was the missionary. And that man was Franklin E. Hoskins, D. D., head of the Presbyterian mission press of Beirut, who is now on a three months' visit to America.

Dr. Hoskins with Three of His Native Friends

Twenty-five years in the Levant makes one a cosmopolite. Conversation with Dr. Hoskins recalls some words of his in Beirut concerning the young American teachers who go out for three-year terms to the great Syrian Protestant College. "Whatever they may do for the college, the college makes men of them. They get more in those three years than they could possibly give." The diversity of interests of a missionary in Syria ranges all the way from archæology to the latest thing in railway promotion. Speaking the Arabic language fluently, Dr. Hoskins naturally comes into intimate touch with the life of the people, having friendships high and low, with access to those mysterious undercurrents of information which cause the westerner to marvel at the Orient.

Syria Sees Emancipation from Turkey

The reunion of the class of 1883 at Princeton University, and the present state of affairs in Syria, are topics uppermost in Dr. Hoskins's mind just now. Syria, it seems, is within sight of emancipation from the Turkish yoke. He said to me lately:

"The people are hoping that some foreign power will assume control. They say, 'Let us have anybody rather than Turkey.' They are prepared to take even Italy, their late enemy. Most of all they want Britain. Petitions have been flowing into the British government from Syria asking that the British assume a protectorate over the Holy Land. Local conjecture figures on the extension of the British sway up from Egypt, at least as far as Haifa, which is at the upper end of Mount Carmel. Then it is rumored that France will get the remainder of Syria up to Aleppo; and Russia is surely coming down from above. There are grave objections to such a partition as this. It would put the triple entente in complete control of a most important stretch of territory. Germany would never consent to this. She would fight first. It is the darling desire of Emperor William to have Germany dominant in the Holy Land.

"The issue will probably be the internationalization of Syria, with joint control by the powers, such as is proposed for Albania. It is significant that the British now have a committee at work studying this very subject of international authority for a given territory. Meanwhile, assured of the early breaking up of Asiatic Turkey, each of the nations is looking into its rights and interests, and stressing their importance.

"Once more there is a confluence of world tides upon this historic land of Palestine, and, as of old, the Promised Land is becoming the meeting place of the nations. The people themselves are sure that something will happen soon, and whatever it may be, it will be for the betterment of Syria."

Like most men who have lived long in the East, Dr. Hoskins is worth watching as he talks, as well as listening to. He has unconsciously absorbed the gestures of his native neighbors, although these mean nothing to the westerner unfamiliar with the East. Thus he occasionally touches his forehead as he speaks, or points to his breast with both hands, or with finger and thumb seems to draw a stream of words from his mouth. It is thus that the Arabs speak beneath their black tents in the desert. It was natural that the talk should proceed to the new movement for Arabic-speaking independence.

Reform Leaders Imprisoned; Strike Follows

"The old grievance of the people of Syria, who all speak Arabic, and of the Arabs proper, is now assuming new forms. The Turks for a generation have been imposing their own language upon the parts of the empire where Arabic is spoken. This has caused innumerable outbreaks and difficulties, and the Arabs have never ceased to protest. The injustice of this is most manifest when it comes to the courts, where the judge speaks only Turkish, while the prisoner, or parties to a suit, speak only Arabic. The same sort of corruption and evil results which has been found in many treaties written by Greek dragomans in the past—treaties which say one thing in one copy and another thing in another.

"Aroused by Arabic unrest recently, the governor of Syria promised various concessions. Then, suddenly changing his mind, or having it changed for him from Constantinople, he threw six of the reform leaders into prison. At once, in protest, a novel strike was instituted. Every shop in the city of Beirut closed its doors. This action created a tense situation, and during the agitation the Moslems were holding political meetings in the mosques.

"Their plan was to precipitate foreign intervention, which is the one constant nightmare of the Turkish government. They decided that the murder of a foreigner would insure this, so they drew lots as to which of the prominent foreigners in Beirut should be assassinated. To their own disgust the lot fell upon the British consul general. As soon as the latter heard of what was impending—and we always do hear of such things in the East—he went to and fro in the streets of Beirut, night and day, like a raging lion, defying them to do their worst. His courage, and some change of plans, squelched that plot."

As we talked, there was a sound of blasting in a distant quarry, which I did not notice. Dr. Hoskins called attention to it, remarking, "If we heard sounds like that in Beirut we should surmise that a massacre had started." Thus Turkey lives in constant apprehension of an outbreak. "Any spark may set the tinder afire. At present the point of danger seems to be with the Armenians. They themselves are sure that a wholesale massacre is being planned by the Kurds. They have sent a deputation to Constantinople to protest and to claim protection. They point out that the same signs which have preceded the massacres of other years are now to be found in Armenia. If there is an outbreak, it will probably be the occasion for Russia's coming down to Armenia's rescue—and at the same time possessing herself of the territory she covets.

"The troublesome elements that make up the Turkish empire, as the Kurds, the Arabs, the Circassians, the Albanians and the Armenians, can scarcely longer hold together, since the downfall of Turkish prestige and power."

Dr. Hoskins seems to think that the end is inevitable and not far distant, and that the final break-up of Turkey will come by the early intervention of the powers.

No views of the Near East can range afield without striking the Bagdad railway, that perplexing question of years. I asked Dr. Hoskins about it.

Early Completion of the Bagdad Railway

"It now seems so near settlement that we may look for the road's swift completion. Of course the whole work should have been done by this time, according to the original contract, if Turkey had paid up her kilometric guaranty. This, naturally, she has not done, and the concessionaires have a longer time in which to finish the road. An agreement has been reached between Great Britain and Germany concerning the Persian gulf end of the railway. German control ends at Bagdad. The lower section of the line, through Mesopotamia and terminating at Kaweit, will be internationalized, which means practical British control. This puts the development of Mesopotamia largely into British hands."

It takes many tellings to enable the reader to understand the historic character of this road, which traverses not only the route of the children of Israel to their exile, but the highway followed by Cyrus, and Alexander the Great, and Xenophon, and most of the conquerors of the East. Dr. Hoskins says that the line has now gone to Carchemish on the Euphrates river, the Hittite capital where Nebuchadnezzar conquered Pharaoh Necho. The British museum is conducting an archæological expedition in Carchemish, and it has unearthed wonderful Hittite inscriptions. The Bagdad railway has reached the Taurus mountains on the Asia Minor side, and it has also gone forty miles north from Aleppo. In the West there is no apparent relation between railways and religion. Quite otherwise in the East.

"Both the Mecca railway and the Siberian railway are increasing the hordes of Mecca pilgrims whom we see at Beirut. Every year a larger number come from central Asia, using the Siberian railway, and bearing little books of direction in several languages from the Russian government. These serve also as passports and enable these pilgrims from the center of Asia to be passed on from point to point, until they reach Mecca, their goal."

Prospects for Christianity's Spread Are Cheering

Dr. Hoskins is enthusiastic over the prospects for Christianity. Ever since the constitutional era there has been a new feeling of tolerance. The people have assumed that they were permitted to print or to possess any sort of literature.

"Our mission press has circulated more books and tracts and portions of Scripture in the past five years than in the preceding fifty years. An extraordinary fact, which I have proved by careful investigation, is that most of the Bibles which we have sold have been bought by Moslems. The people of the East are deeply religious, and with freedom to read they study all religious literature. The result is that the Moslem reformers, who see the new peril that confronts them from Christianity, are raking the Koran and their sacred books for anything analogous to the fundamental Christian teachings. They want to show, so far as possible, that Islam teaches the same things as Christianity. The new missionary who comes to Moslem lands must be equipped to meet this kind of opposition.

"The extension of our Syria mission is one result of the war. We have decided to move up to ancient Aleppo, the city of Abraham's white cow, and there reoccupy. Also we shall go east of the Jordan."

Dr. Hoskins was significantly vague as to the location of the new trans-Jordan station.

"By the way, do you know that the United Presbyterians have recently got a colporteur and boatload of Bibles into Jiddah, the Red sea port of Mecca, and that he has been unmolested in the months since?

War Gave Christianity Chance to Prove Itself

"One of the unexpected consequences of the recent Turkish disasters has been the effect of the attitude of the Christians upon the Moslems. The latter assumed that their Christian neighbors would gloat over them, and if possible persecute them because of their crushing defeats. To their amazement it was the Christians who cared for them in hospitals and by the wayside. The Red Cross, rather than the Red Crescent, proved the symbol of succor. The wounded and the poverty stricken have found the Christians their most helpful and friendly neighbors. This practical proof of the Christian religion has deeply touched the hearts of the Moslems."

It is good to think that at this critical hour, and at this newly strategic center, the land of the Bible, the Christian church is firmly planted, with a superb evangelizing equipment, and that she is represented by such men of vision as the veteran Arabic scholar, administrator, traveler and preacher, Dr. Franklin E. Hoskins.

When It's "the Other Fellow"

Have you ever noticed? When the Other Fellow acts that way he is "ugly"; when you do it's "nerves." When the Other Fellow is set in his ways he's "obstinate"; when you are, it is just "firmness," remarks Life.

When the Other Fellow doesn't like your friend he's "prejudiced"; when you don't like his you are simply showing that you are a good judge of human nature.

When the Other Fellow tries to treat someone especially well he is "toadying"; when you try the same game you are using "tact."

When the Other Fellow takes time to do things he is "dead slow"; when you do it you are "deliberate."

When the Other Fellow spends a lot he is a "spendthrift"; when you do you are "discriminating."

When the Other Fellow holds too tight to his money he is "close"; when you do you are "prudent."

When the Other Fellow dresses extra well he's a "dude"; when you do it is simply "a duty one owes to society."

When the Other Fellow runs great risks in business he's "foolhardy"; when you do you are a "great financier."

When the Other Fellow says what he thinks he's "spiteful"; when you do you are "frank."

When the Other Fellow won't get caught in a new scheme he's "backwoodsy"; when you won't you are "conservative."

When the Other Fellow goes in for music and pictures and literature he's "effeminate"; when you do you are "artistic."

She Was a Match for Him

Dr. Abernathy, the famous Scotch surgeon, was a man of few words, but he once met his match—in a woman. She called at his office in Edinburgh one day, says The New York Mail, and showed a hand badly inflamed and swollen, when the following dialogue, opened by the doctor, took place:

"Burn?"

"Bruise."

"Poultice."

The next day the woman called again, and the dialogue was as follows:

"Better?"

"Worse."

"More poultice."

Two days later the woman made another call, and this conversation occurred:

"Better?"

"Well. Fee?"

"Nothing!" growled the doctor. "Most sensible woman I ever met!"

Making Sure

The ferryboat was well on her way when a violent storm arose. The ferryman and his mate (both Highlanders) held a consultation, and after a short debate the ferryman turned to his passengers and remarked anxiously:

"We'll just tak your tuppences now, for we dinna ken what micht come ower us."

A Red Hat and a Question

BY MARY E. McDOWELL

A few days ago the mayor of Chicago and an official committee "investigated" the garbage plant where the refuse of the city is utilized. The committee reported that the plant was "as clean as an old maid's kitchen." Several days later at daybreak two women from the University Settlement made an unannounced visit to the same place. They found a different state of affairs, and said so before the council committee. One of these women was Miss Mary McDowell, head resident of the settlement; the friend and adviser of countless folk of every condition in the unsavory district near the stock yards, where she works for the uplift of the people among whom she lives. Continent readers have frequently been moved by her facility in telling things she sees and feels

An 18-Year-Old Wage Earner

I HAD BEEN speaking on "Woman in Industry" in the north end of the city, and was returning to the stock yards district at 11 o'clock at night. I had been speaking to a well-to-do church; my audience was composed of people in comfortable circumstances, far from the life which I was trying to make clear to them. They found it difficult to realize the tremendous fact that more than half of our American girls are in gainful occupations and that Germany alone has 9,000,000 women earning some kind of livelihood, and that the women in China, Japan and India are being used in large numbers as factory hands and are beginning to think with their sisters of the Occident.

It was a cold, wet night. My friends had protested against my taking a Halsted street car at so late an hour alone. As I sat, feeling somewhat discouraged over my efforts to arouse the good people who were comfortable, I found that the car was filling up with Italians and Poles, and that my seat had to be shared with someone else. The car had stopped at a street crossing in a part of the city shunned by those who are timid. Here another group of foreigners—mostly men—pushed their way into the crowded car, and in their midst I was attracted by a spot of bright color. It was the red hat on a young girl unaccompanied.

"Young Mothers" Leaving a Box Factory in Halsted Street

I soon discovered that this bright spring hat was shading the face of a girl about 18 years of age. She was alone in this questionable part of a city made up of many kinds of people, yet she seemed perfectly at ease as she viewed the possible chances for a seat. She ignored a seat next to a young Polish man, and turned smilingly toward my proffered hospitality. As she smiled at me I was able to get a clear impression of the possibilities of this young girl beside me—a type of the problem about which I had been talking at the church of comfortable souls. The pretty red hat was framing a baby face with a pretty, pouting mouth, large round eyes that seemed to be wondering, but not questioning much. Her clothes were ready-made, with the same fashionable lines for coat and narrow skirt that I had seen at the church. The white shirtwaist was from the same bargain counter from which many of the women in my audience had purchased, and perhaps never knew that it took fifty hands to make that waist. Her clothes, at least, related her to the other women in the great city of Chicago, for their dresses also were ready-made, and all of them wore garments made by machinery, fed by the hands of girls and children.

The Girl of 18 and Her Experiences

As she seated herself by my side, she gave me a smile such as any little child might have offered to a stranger with whom she felt at ease. "I'm only 18, but nearly everyone takes me for 24," were the confidential words which this child handed me without solicitation on my part. Sitting in front of us were a Polish man and wife and little girl. The child was chattering Polish to the mother, much to the delight of my young companion. "Ain't it wonderful," she said, "the way such a little child can talk that awful language!" Then she went on talking to me about her experience in the store where she worked—one of the largest department stores in State street. And again she revealed her childish, unsophisticated mind by telling me of the children that came into the store "all alone." "Why," she went on, "today two little boys came in alone, and I wanted some candy so bad, and didn't dare leave my counter, so I asked 'em if they would go downstairs to the candy counter and get me some candy. I gave 'em some pennies and told 'em to bring it up to me, and do you know, they never came back! Ain't it awful the way mothers bring up such children?"

Where was this unsophisticated, self-reliant young thing going? Where had she been? Who was mothering her baby mind? These were the questions that came naturally to me. "Where do you live?" I asked. "Near Halsted and 29th. I board," she answered. "I pay only $3 for my room and two meals a day." "And what wages do you receive?" I questioned. "Oh, I get $6 a week!" she responded in that tone that is so eternally feminine. I was reminded of another girl, who said in the same resigned tone when asked "How can you live on 75 cents a day?" "Oh, you know you have to." I thought I would test her. "Did you hear about the meeting of clerks to organize an association to see if they could get a half holiday in summer and better wages for themselves?" I inquired. The round eyes looked at me with their childish wonder. "Oh," she said, "maybe that was what was on those cards the woman gave me—bottom side up so none of the floor walkers would catch on. Maybe I'll go to the next meeting. Do you have anything to do with it?" I told her how much I believe in girls who work looking after themselves and not being satisfied with wages that could not give them a healthy living. "Yes, that's right. Good-by. Maybe I'll come to the meeting," and she left the car at a dark corner on Halsted street to sleep in a home that was not her mother's home, just as she worked in a public, crowded place, where no mother followed her or looked after her.

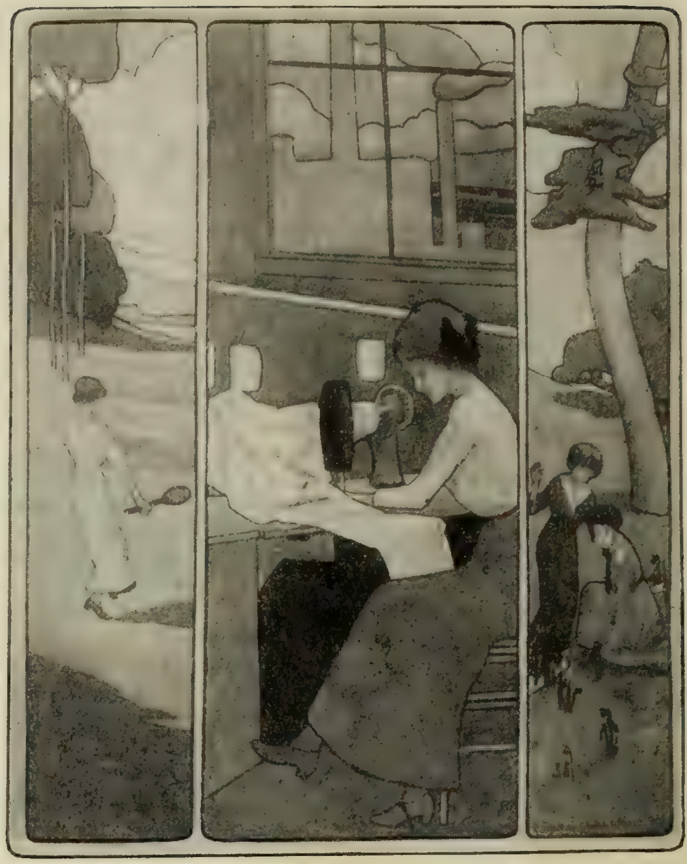
What does it all mean to the future homes? Where is it leading us? Six dollars a week, three of which go for shelter and two meals. And what about her lunches, 15 cents a day; her laundry, 30 cents a week; carfare, 60 cents; clothes, $1; leaving 45 cents for all emergencies that come to human beings, young as well as old. What about her recreation?—for youth must have pleasure. A girl of 18 cannot work and eat and sleep only. "A girl must have some fun, or commit suicide," one working girl said to me when she was protesting against the small wages that allowed only for the barest necessities.

One of Many Thousand Who Are Adrift

This very attractive young human being with the red hat and cheap, ready-made clothes is simply one of the many thousands of wage-earning girls who are adrift in Chicago, according to the federal labor bureau. Some are sharing the room of another girl; some, we are told, are living with men whom they love, but who cannot afford to marry them. Some go wrong in other ways, but most try to live on the meager "wages of righteousness," but are undernourished and are without the minimum of civilized life all the time. They lack all that is the right of a young human being of the mother sex. Sunshine, fresh air, wholesome recreation, skill in housekeeping crafts, sympathy, appreciation and love—these are the necessities of a young life. How can all of these be secured at $6 a week in a city like Chicago?

A waitress whom I know gave me her budget to show the problem of a girl who must live on her own earnings. She received $8 a week and two meals daily for seven days. She said that she had had about seven weeks of sickness that year. The next year this same girl was in the hospital for several weeks, and had to depend upon the union for support. This was her budget as she gave it to me:

	Per week.	Per year.
Shelter	$2.50	$130.00
Laundry	1.25	65.00
Carfare	.70	36.40
Clothes	....	133.65
Total		$365.05



"A girl must have some fun or commit suicide"
Part of poster shown at Child Welfare Exhibition, Chicago, in behalf of the half-holiday movement

Her wages must average more than $7 a week to meet this outlay if anything is to be left for emergencies, recreation or sickness This waitress had not had even $8 a week until a union was organized, and, as she put it, "It took a long struggle for us girls to get even 'decent conditions.'" The merchants that came before the senatorial investigating commission lately said that they knew that a girl could not live in Chicago on $6 a week, but that their girls all lived at home, and that on that fact they based their wage scale. Is this a fair basis? Who lives at home with them? Who supplies the rent, the laundry and the clothes for those who receive from $4 to $6? And there are thousands of these girls, according to the federal and state investigations, who are supporting others than themselves.

From Massachusetts and Australia

The Massachusetts minimum wage commission investigated 1,218 women over 18 years old who reported their age and wages. Forty-one per cent received less than $5, and 65 per cent received less than $6. The new Massachusetts minimum wage law says that a living wage is one that supplies the necessary cost of living and must maintain the worker in health. This is the only true basis for wages—to maintain the worker in health. The minimum wage has been in force in Australia for eighteen years and has now ninety-one industries that are under the wage boards. Even the employers would not rescind this law. Almost the last act of King Edward of England was the signing of a minimum wage act for the sweated trades, and the three years' experience has been so wholesome for the community that parliament is hoping to bring other trades under the wages board appointed by the board of trade.

At first the trade unions were not in favor of having wages raised by wage boards composed of employers and employees, with a disinterested person as chairman, but now they see that there are workers who are below the level of organization, and that society must secure for them what they cannot obtain for themselves. I believe that workingwomen must be encouraged to organize and to look after their own interests, but I know that in certain industries they are too young and too inexperienced to help themselves. The young girls who are adrift in our cities, and those who are carrying the burden of the home, must be helped by the rest of us. For their own self-protection they must begin to think about their wages and not look to others to supply the necessities of a human living. The self-reliant young girl with her ready-made clothes and bright red hat is a symbol of the problem that confronts all who think and feel. America dare not have a class of people who must depend upon charity for sufficient food and clothes to maintain a healthy and moral life. The minimum wage may ask the lovers of candy to pay a few cents on the 90,000,000 pounds of candy that are sold in Chicago during Christmas week; but it will also cut down the charity gifts.

A Large Question for Christian Women

Shall we Christian women do all in our power to produce conditions that shall encourage the spiritual possibilities which are dormant in these wage-earning girls, or shall we, through indifference and selfishness, leave them alone—adrift in the city that cares nothing for their souls? The girl with the red hat must typify to us the little sisters that need our sympathetic understanding and our practical efforts to protect them until they can protect themselves. It is a large question that presses for an answer.

Moody's Valuation of "Sand"

BY CHARLES STELZLE

Mr. Stelzle's announced change of work, commented upon by The Continent last week, makes this article by him, with its sidelight of autobiography, particularly timely. His speculation as to what would be D. L. Moody's attitude toward present economic problems and conditions is interesting.

"YOU WILL NEVER make a preacher. Possibly after you have spent three years in a theological seminary you may prove to be acceptable to a little country church in which the people aren't very particular." This was the only encouragement given me during my machine-shop days when the burden of becoming a Christian minister was heavy upon me. Then I honestly tried to break into three different theological seminaries, but they would not have me. They declared that I did not know enough. To be sure, I was fully conscious of my ignorance—this is why I desired to take the seminary course. But the presidents of the seminaries with whom I corresponded would not see it my way.

Somebody told me about the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago. I wrote to Mr. Moody, telling him my situation, referring him to a mutual friend for particulars. A few days later Mr. Moody met my friend, who presented my case, and the big human evangelist and leader asked him simply one question: "Has he 'sand'?" I was accepted. No doubt "sand" is a very poor substitute for scholarship in a theological seminary, but I have always been grateful to the man who made it possible for fellows like myself to enter the Christian ministry.

Humor Reenforcing Common Sense

Mr. Moody frequently addressed the students at the institute. The fine ideals he held up before us were decidedly inspirational. Perhaps this was the best service that he rendered for the students. I never heard him without coming away with a bigger conception of what it meant to be a Christian worker. But always was there a healthy, sane presentation of his message, and invariably a touch of humor. In the classroom he often asked the students for new ideas. One day a particularly clever plan was suggested by one of the men with reference to Sunday school work. "What do you think about this?" he asked the superintendent of the Moody church Sunday school, who was present. "We've been aiming to do it for two years," replied the superintendent. "Don't you think it's about time you fired?" quickly laughed Mr. Moody.

Mr. Moody never seemed to me just like an evangelist. There was an utter lack of professionalism about him. He appeared never to be afraid of the difficult places. To him it was a question of an opportunity for doing a big piece of work for God. But Mr. Moody did not always succeed. We think of him as the leader of tremendous campaigns in metropolitan centers. One day about fifteen years ago he was challenged to spend a month in the old church now being used as the Labor temple in lower New York. He came with his workers, but apparently he failed dismally. His methods would not work. He went immediately afterwards to a great auditorium uptown which seated thousands, and many were turned away. This failure has been to me a source of encouragement, for personal failures in other places have since been less difficult to bear, and had we failed at the Labor temple it would not have seemed so cruel.

Broad Understanding of Differing Types

The breadth of view of this remarkable man was stimulating, especially in a day when narrowness with reference to methods of work and theological belief controlled to so great a dgree. I once heard him in the Moody church make an earnest plea for $500 to be used for the work of the boys' brigade, and he spoke most cordially of its institutional features. He gave the Roman Catholic church in Northfield a fine organ, "for," said he, "if they are going to have music, they might better have good music," and the Catholics retaliated by furnishing enough stone to build the foundation of the Congregational church of which Mr. Moody was a chief supporter.

Big and strong as he was, Mr. Moody impressed me by his tenderness of feeling. He frequently preached with tears in his eyes, but he never became soft or sentimental. He loved men, and he loved little children, too. The first time that I ever saw him he was talking to a young sister of mine in an inquiry room in a mission chapel on the East side of New York. She was about 14, and Mr. Moody was telling her about his Saviour. He preached a gospel of hope. The first three times that I heard Mr. Moody preach, each time in a different city, he used as his text Isaiah 55:7—"Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." Mr. Moody believed in hell, but he preached the love of God to save men from hell.

Leadership Adapted and Adaptable

Even during Mr. Moody's day there came the manifestations of swift change in our social and economic conditions. He often spoke of the problems of the workingman. Whether or not he could have met the modern situation it is not possible to say. I know that the narrower followers of this great man will at once declare that were Mr. Moody here today he would preach the same gospel that he always preached in just the same old way. I do not believe it. He would apply the old gospel to the present situation. I am sure, at any rate, that instead of blindly applying old methods, which simply do not touch the problems of this generation, he would study the needs of the people, both rich and poor, and adapt his message accordingly. He would preach the gospel of Jesus Christ in sincerity and in truth, but it would be a gospel as deep as human need and as wide as human experience. If it seemed impossible for him to sound all the depths of the present-day situation, he would rejoice that other men had been given a vision which made them clear-eyed and strong-hearted.

Mr. Moody often told the story that the beginning of his power came with the realization that God was waiting to find a man through whom he might show the world what he could do with one who was thoroughly devoted to him. God is waiting for such a man today. In each period of the world's greatest need there was raised up a man who became God's messenger for the time in which he lived. If ever there was a period when a great leader was needed, this is the day.

The Mortgage on Martin Kenzie's Brains

And How His Mother Innocently Forced a Foreclosure

BY AILEEN CLEVELAND HIGGINS

PART II.

ONE MORNING five months later Mrs. Kenzie brought Martin his breakfast unusually early, and as she drew back the curtain he was astonished to see that she was attired in the black dress she had not worn since her husband's funeral. The expression upon her face was that of one chastened and prepared for the worst.

"Why, mother," Martin ejaculated, propping himself upon one elbow, "what in the world is the matter?"

"Martin, do you mean to say you don't know what day of the month this is?"

"It's the 2d of October."

"Yes, the 2d of October," his mother repeated gravely.

"Well?"

"Martin Kenzie, you are makin' me speak of the mortgage again to you, and I made up my mind I wouldn't after that day you got so worked up in the garden. Mr. Ripley's comin' today—it's the day of the foreclosin'. You've seemed in such good spirits I couldn't bear to mention it again, but I didn't s'pose you'd forgotten——"

"No, I hadn't forgotten it, but seeing you in your black dress made me think there was some funeral."

"Well, it's a good deal like that to me, and I wanted to put on appropr'ate clothes. Land knows what's goin' to become of us. If I jes' had part of the money to stave him off—a hundred would do it, or even fifty, I reckon. Mr. Ripley is that kind he would do anything to help us if there was any show for us—but I ain't got a cent more'n enough to pay for this week's groceries. I do dread his comin' terr'ble. I feel like runnin' away somewheres. I wish he'd come and get it over with. I've been up since 4 o'clock—all the work's done, so there ain't nothin' for me to do but wait, and waitin' is terr'ble hard to stand. Mebbe if I read a little out of some of your papers it'll help out."

She extricated a magazine near the top of the litter on Martin's table and sat down by the window to read. For a while she rocked back and forth as she read, then suddenly she stopped with a violent jerk. "Why, Martin," she exclaimed, "there's a back yard in this story just like ours."

"Is that so, mother?" replied Martin tentatively. "Do you think it is a good story?"

"I'll jes' read on a little so's to see—it's short."

Many minutes ticked by without another word from her. Martin finished his breakfast, and lay back on his pillows, with closed eyes, waiting.

"Martin," he heard his mother say presently in a voice that was tense, "it's me in this story—and your pa! What on earth does it mean? Here are things I never told a livin' soul but you. How could John Stearns—that's the name of the man that wrote the story—ever know about these things? Who is he, anyhow? No one I ever heard of around here. I feel as if I've been turned wrong side out for people to laugh at—and your pa, too—it's a shame—a burnin' shame——"

"I was afraid you'd feel like that about it," said Martin, flushing under her sharp gaze.

"What do you mean, Martin Kenzie?" demanded his mother, standing over him with the magazine in her hand. "What did you have to do with it?"

"I wrote it—that's all, mother. I'm John Stearns—I signed another name."

"You wrote it?" shrilled his mother. "My own son could do such a thing?" Amazement and anger twisted her face in a fashion so terrible to Martin that he cowered instinctively back among his pillows.

"It's true, mother—I did it," he faltered.

As she gazed at him her anger was suddenly swept away by a grief which forced her sobbing to her knees beside the bed.

"Mother, mother, let me explain!" cried Martin, tremblingly, timidly placing his hand upon her head. "It came to me that day in the garden that maybe I could write a story about you that would sell. I'd read so many stories that I could tell things in your life were what writers call 'good material.' I thought I'd try just to see, and I had beginner's luck. Here's the letter I got from the editor. He says I've got something new—that you're an original character that'll please the public. He published it almost at once."

THE HOME COUNCIL

The Traveler Courteous

By Lee McCrae

"MEN WHO WORK for me must have plenty of likes and no dislikes," said a prominent man when complimented on the splendid banking institution he has built up, and asked for his "secrets."

"She never saw a fault if she could help it; and if she did see it, no one ever knew she saw it," says a writer in a current magazine concerning "the first lady of Alabama."

Would that every one of us seeking business and social success could take these two sententious utterances as texts and preach ourselves some private, heart-searching sermons thereon! The composite result would be an avalanche of cheer and new courage that is sorely needed in these days of pin-prick criticism.

Especially would I recommend these texts to travelers far from home. Almost every magazine we pick up contains advice to guests on how to make themselves agreeable, and the suggestions are, for the most part, exceedingly sensible and practical. But far better than punctuality at meals, helpfulness in the home and all that is generally accepted as essential to the make-up of a desirable guest would be this tactful ability to like everything or else ignore it.

This ability is peculiarly needed when one has taken a long jump, for I know by experience how easy it is to be hypercritical at such times and to make comparisons, forgetting that "comparisons are odious" and always in poor taste.

The attitude of the usual visitor coming from a distant part of this big country of ours is excessively "judgmatical." He has come, naturally and rightfully, with wide-open eyes and ears. He is looking for new things and differences—as he should. Travelers ought to be keenly observant and also discriminating. What I am objecting to is that he should voice his observations so loudly, make such sweeping assertions on brief experience and reach such radical conclusions that they can be neither just nor correct.

Many are also guilty of prejudging. They come with a settled opinion concerning conditions, and the first corroborating evidence is loudly proclaimed in an I-told-you-so tone. Whatever evidence of a contrary condition may come to their attention, they are simply not to be convinced.

A continuous flaw-finding shows the visitor to be on the hunt for the very things which the citizens deplore and would eliminate if they could. For every right-minded person loves his home and its surroundings, while fully aware that it has its deficiences, even its downright evils; consequently both personal and civic pride are hurt by the feeling that everything is under scrutiny—on exhibition, as it were—being "weighed in the balances" and inevitably "found wanting," because the self-appointed judge is putting all the flaws on the scales and leaving off the virtues.

Yet it is not in direct argument, in which statements can be contradicted by facts, but in little naggy observations that this attitude is manifested. "How the wind blows in this country!" (You know that windy days are the exception). "The sun must be awfully hard on paint down here." "Don't you hate to see dirty gloves?" (A passenger in the car is under fire.) "What a rude motorman! I supposed all southern men were gentlemen!" "Dear me! Do all your men smoke cigarettes?"

Small comments like these betoken a small mind and also a limited experience. For the real globe-trotter, while he sees little things, has learned to place them where they belong. He has the large vision that puts everything in its relative place, and consequently he does not judge a section wholly by its extremes or peculiarities. Indeed, what seem oddities to the limited traveler are but ordinary to him who has met them in many places.

The globe-trotter realizes, as the inexperienced do not, that sectional differences and peculiarities are rapidly being wiped out by the intermingling of all Americans, commercially and socially. Very soon we shall be a cosmopolitan people. Once upon a time there may have been a "typical western girl," "a typical southern gentleman," a "New England woman"; but that is hardly the case now. We have nearly all kinds of Americans in all our towns and nearly all kinds of conditions in every section save the most remote and isolated. So let visitors in any section refrain from publishing their own limitations by proclaiming the "oddities" they have discovered.

To be an agreeable guest demands the gracious tact that either "likes" things or else fails to mention them. An application of the golden rule brings the fullness of politeness, kindliness and Christian culture. Travelers must continually bear in mind the fact that the section from which they come is being judged by what they say and do and are.

He Located His Lamb

The Buffalo News tells of a traveling man who, on his marriage, was given a month's vacation. He and his bride passed their honeymoon in a quiet summer resort.

One evening as they entered the dining room and sat down, as usual, in a secluded corner, the young husband noticed a good customer at the table near by.

"Say, dearest," he whispered, "there's Mr. Jones over there. You won't mind if I go over and dine with him, will you? Think how fine it will be if I get back from my wedding trip with a smashing big order."

The little bride agreed rather ruefully. Her traveling man hurried over to Jones, shook hands with him and ordered his dinner, which included roast lamb. Then he began to talk business.

He talked so earnestly and at such length that he didn't notice when the waiter removed his meat dishes and placed a dessert before him. Then suddenly he looked down at his plate.

"Why," he exclaimed, "where's my lamb?"

A little voice in the corner piped out, "Here I am, dear!"

Verses Old and New

HEART VENTURES

I stood and watched my ships go out,
Each, one by one, unmooring free,
What time the quiet harbor filled
With flood tide from the sea.

The first that sailed, her name was Joy.
She spread a smooth, white ample sail,
And eastward drove with bending spars
Before the singing gale.

Another sailed, her name was Hope.
No cargo in her hold she bore,
Thinking to find in western lands
Of merchandise a store.

The next that sailed, her name was Love.
She showed a red flag at the mast—
A flag as red as blood she showed,
And she sped south right fast.

The last that sailed, her name was Faith.
Slowly she took her passage forth;
Tacked and lay to; at last she steered
A straight course for the north.

My gallant ships they sailed away
Over the shimmering summer sea;
I stood at watch for many a day.
But one came back to me.

For Joy was caught by Pirate Pain;
Hope ran upon a hidden reef,
And Love took fire and foundered fast
In whelming seas of Grief.

Faith came at last, storm-bent and torn,
She recompensed me all my loss,
For as a cargo safe she brought
A crown linked to a cross.

TONGS CONQUER TONGUE

A good woman was sadly annoyed by a termagant neighbor, who often visited her and provoked a quarrel. She at last sought the counsel of her pastor.

"Well," he said, when he had heard the story, "suppose you try the snap cure. The next time she visits you take the tongs in your hand, and whenever she says anything unkind, snap the tongs together, but say nothing yourself."

A day or two afterwards the good woman came again to her pastor, laughing this time.

"It worked beautifully," she said. "My troubler came to see me yesterday, and, as usual, commenced her tirade. At the first hateful word, snap! went the tongs. Another volley. Snap! Another still. Snap!

"'Why don't you say something?' she exclaimed angrily. Snap!

"'Speak!' she cried. Snap!

"'Do speak! I you don't speak I shall split!' And away she went. I was just suffering to laugh, and I think when she calmed down she must have seen the funny side of it, too. Perhaps after this she'll let the tongs do all her snapping for her."

And if the story from which this anecdote is taken speaks truly, she did.

SIMPLIFYING THE SUNDAY TEA

It has been suggested that the Sunday supper may be in part responsible for "blue Monday," for the rest which the day provides doesn't always extend to the digestion. A late dinner, often heartier than usual, a quiet afternoon and a heavy supper mean a busy night for the overworked stomach.

Jellied meat or salad, preferably of fruit, with bread and butter, is quite sufficient for the third Sunday meal. Some people desire nothing more than chocolate and a sandwich; others find chocolate too heavy and prefer just their cup o' tea, with perhaps a bun, or a bit of coffee cake, and some fruit.

In most households the preparation of this informal meal falls upon the house mother. In a certain household, spoken of in The New York Tribune, the little daughters are permitted to take turns at its preparation, with the understanding that the meal must be limited to sandwiches or an equivalent, cake, fruit, chocolate or tea. They enjoy making the sandwiches, and explore the cookbooks for new recipes. The mother is taken into their confidence, but the rest of the family are not allowed to know what they are to have.

"I keep up their interest," said their mother, "by letting them have freedom of choice in the purchase and preparation of food materials. But I caution them that the filling of the sandwiches must not be a sweet one—that it must contain meat, fish, cheese or an egg mixture, as the sandwiches are supposed to take the place of a dish containing protein. The Sunday tea is supposed to be 'a light and airy nothing,' yet it must be properly balanced and not entirely composed of starches and sugars. In fact, I have given them each a little book containing a list of foods and their value as such, so they can plan a suitable menu."

Serving the Sunday tea in the library or sitting room in the winter, and on the porch in the summer, removes all formality, promotes a most delightful spirit of sociability and good fellowship, and relieves whoever prepares it of the burden of setting the table and "cleaning up" afterwards. The complete change of scene at this one mealtime of the week is also a distinct advantage. S. C. R.

Pug o' the Laurel Bush

BY MARGARET HAYNE

PART I.

PUGGY lived in a beautiful old California garden near the Golden Gate, where the great ships come into San Francisco bay from the Far East. The garden was old-fashioned, with cool lawns and old trees, and plenty of roses and lavender bushes; it was inclosed by high green hedges, and the family who owned the garden and Puggy and the rambling, pleasant green house were very happy. There were mamma, papa, Big Sister, Big College Brother, Little Sister and Little Brother. They loved books and music and their rose trees, but most of all they loved "our dear animals," as Little Brother called them. Rosy and Tom Lamb and dear little Puggy were as much a part of the family as anyone else.

Tom Lamb was a great gray Angora, with a huge bushy tail and eyes that glowed so strangely that Big Sister said she believed he was really some unhappy prince of ancient Egypt, who had been turned into a cat for a punishment. Tom was always solemn and silent, but sometimes when he was unusually pleasant he would gravely offer his paw and shake hands.

Rosy was an Irish setter, and she and Tom Lamb were the inseparable companions of Puggy, the hero of this story.

At one never to be forgotten time Rosy had had eight black puppies. One night these puppies were heard in the back yard, barking shrilly. Big College Brother went out to investigate and found them excitedly surrounding a laurel bush. College Brother pushed the dogs away and called to someone to bring a candle. And there they spied a little pug dog with his tail curled as tight as a doughnut.

He was lonely and cold and had lost his way. He was taken up to the nursery, where he lay sick for a week, while every effort was made to find his owners. But no answer ever came to their advertisement, so he was adopted as the family's own.

No name ever seemed to suit him like Pug o' the Laurel Bush. Little Sister saved up her pennies and bought him a beautiful collar with blue stones. Big Sister took him walking every afternoon, and when it was cold she dressed him up in a little blue and white coat to match his collar. When the children went to the seashore to bathe they took Puggy, too, and he would stand on the shore and bark with fear as he saw them swimming away, for he was afraid of water. And when he saw them coming back onto the beach he would run to meet them, dancing with joy.

One day a notice came that there was to be a dog show in San Francisco, and papa suggested sending Puggy. So he was bathed and scrubbed and combed and packed up in a basket and carried over to a great hall, where nearly 200 dogs were penned up in cages, waiting for the show to begin. Some of the poor dogs were very unhappy, and howled and barked and begged to be taken home; some spent their time growling and snarling at the cages across the way. There was every kind of dog—from the giant Great Dane to the tiny snow-white French poodles.

It was all very exciting to Puggy, and when the people stopped before his cage and spoke to him he would curl his tail all the tighter and dance with glee, till everyone spoke of him as the "little pug that dances." Then papa came and took him up on a platform, where there were three other people holding little pugs by leashes; and he had to walk around in a circle, looking down on a sea of faces; and there was a strange man with a badge on who came and held Puggy's head up and examined his legs and his walk. Then the man hesitated and looked carefully at the other puggies. Then everyone clapped loudly and the man held out a blue ribbon and a huge silver cup to papa. Puggy didn't know what it meant. He heard the man say, "No. 306, registered 'Pug o' the Laurel Bush,' best pug on the Pacific coast." And papa laughed and seemed very happy, and everybody crowded around to pat the winner.

But how he hated that show before it was over! For he had to stay there another whole day while the other dogs were being judged. He grew very tired, and yet whenever anyone spoke to him he was so polite that he felt he had to answer. Finally, all tired out, he fell asleep, and when he awoke Big Sister was carrying him home in her arms, together with his silver cup and his blue ribbon.

Puggy Was a Prize Dog

After that he was a prize dog. He went to three other shows, and from each he brought home ribbons and cups, two of silver and one of bronze. He dreaded the shows now, for they meant baths all the time and continual polishings and combings, and the family were so careful what he ate. He couldn't play with Tommy Lamb any more and chase him all over the garden for fear of getting his face scratched. He couldn't have turkey when Tom and Rosy had the remains of that delicious bird one day. "No, no, Puggy!" they said. And Big Sister was always quoting from a dog book rules regarding the proper care of little pugs.

In the summer the family decided to enter Puggy at a great dog show to be held at Santa Cruz, as a beautiful trophy was offered for the best pug. But as none of the family could take him he was to go in charge of a friend of papa's. Poor Pug o' the Laurel Bush started off one hot morning in June and the children gathered at the gate to wave good-by to him.

"Don't get lost, Puggy, dear," called Little Sister, with Tom Lamb gravely watching in her arms.

"Bring back something good, Pug, old boy," shouted Little Brother.

But Pug o' the Laurel Bush was so cross at the prospect of another show that he forgot to curl his tail, and it hung down quite limp and straight.

After a long, dusty train trip with a strange man, who was very nice to him, Puggy was given to one of the dog show attendants at Santa Cruz, as the show did not open till the next day. This man took him, with several other toy dogs, up to the great building where they were to sleep.

The attendant was talking show to one of his friends. Pug o' the Laurel Bush felt the strap that held his collar slacken. Here was his chance! He bobbed, slid his head out of his gorgeous collar, which had always been too large for him, and was off as fast as a galloping broncho around the corner and down the street, into another street, and another, until his breath came so fast he had to stop, and his poor little legs were ready to drop off. At first he had heard the man shouting in the distance, but he had given him the slip completely.

Puggy thought about it contentedly. How hot that hall would be! And those barking dogs were always horrid. But how was he to find the family, and how on earth was he to get out of this city? Night was coming on and he was hungry, too. How he wished he were home again! Pug o' the Laurel Bush whined softly to himself. (To be concluded)

Rhymes to Remember

THE TIRED LITTLE FLOWER

"I'm very tired," sighed Little Flower,
"It's time for me to rest."
The sun in heav'n drew curtains red
Across the golden west!

"I'm thirsty, now," called Little Flower
From out her garden bed:
The dewdrops lay all crystal pure
Upon her nodding head.

"I'm so afraid!" cried Little Flower,
"I wish I had a light."
A million stars looked down from heav'n
To watch her through the night!

His Nose Misled Him

Bobbie used to call on a certain old lady every Saturday afternoon, and she always gave him a piece of cocoanut layer cake. But one Saturday, as she expected company for tea, she decided not to cut the cake, and therefore none was offered Bobbie.

He waited and waited for his usual treat, till finally it came time for him to go.

"I believe I smell cocoanut cake," he remarked wistfully, rising from his chair and looking toward the kitchen.

The lady laughed, went to the pantry and cut him a very tiny slice. Bobbie thanked her and said, "It seems strange that I could smell such a little piece, doesn't it?"

The Mendacious Mole

How far back my family goes.
The first of my name
From Normandy came
On William the Conqueror's nose."

"Grandma" Writes to Young America

DEAR CHILDREN: Marion is my little grandson. Of course I think him a very nice boy, and as others think so too, I guess I am right.

He had a party on his second birthday, only three months ago, so you see he is quite young. There were five little girls and boys near his age, and they had a tea party (only they had milk instead of tea). They had a little table, little chairs and little dishes, and such nice things for little people to eat.

But the best of all was that not one of them cried that afternoon, nor quarreled over their playthings, so the mothers who came with them were very happy and proud.

Marion lives near us, so he comes to see us quite often. I wish you could have seen him last winter when he came, dressed in his little blue coat, cap, mittens and leggings, and his "doggies," as he calls his fur overshoes. But his bright blue eyes and round, rosy cheeks are good to look at.

When he comes in he shakes hands and says, "How do?" and bows his little head. If he can't reach grandma on one side of the cot he goes around to the other side. Then he says, "Kiss grandma," and she is so glad to get a kiss. You see, I can't walk, and I live on the couch mostly. We have lots of fun. He loves to throw things over the cot and say, "Over." And he loves to spin tins to make me laugh. He likes to have me watch him and play with him, and we have such jolly times.

He talks very plainly, trying very hard to say things just as he hears them. When someone is going away he says, "Good-by. Come again. Want to."

When he goes home his first duty is to kiss grandma and then say good-by. When told to come again he says, "Will, thak you." He is such a little gentleman I couldn't help telling you about him. GRANDMA.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

July 27, 1913—Moses' Request Refused

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 4:29—6:1. Golden Text, Matthew 5:4: Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.

Moses hesitated; not that he distrusted God but because he did distrust himself. He was not eloquent, and he knew it. His voice was his pen. The wise man is the one who realizes his own limitations. Besides, there were complications at home. The consent of Jethro must first be obtained before he could return to Egypt, and his family seemed likely to prove an incumbrance. The revelation of Jehovah was something too spiritual for the people to comprehend, and the miracle of such revelation he felt to be essential. To each of these perplexities God responded. The messenger to be successful must first comprehend his message. An uncertain bow is sure to deliver an uncertain arrow. For eighty years Moses had lived unconscious of his mission. There was no one thing on which to concentrate himself. Now all is changed. His work lies before him and he must approach it as one positive of success. But one defect seemed fatal. He was slow of speech and Pharaoh would refuse to listen. On that foot he halted.

Aaron Chosen to Be the Tongue of Moses

It was in anger and yet in love that God assured his servant that Aaron was to be his tongue. The brain of Moses and the lips of Aaron—no such combination had ever existed on the earth before. The two brothers met in the mount and together talked over the monumental task marked out of God. There stood the Jachin and Boaz, the strength and beauty of Israel. The civil and the religious history of a nation were spread out like two books waiting to be written upon. The conversation of those men transcends the imagination. For forty years they had lived apart. Time had done its work. The Scriptures say that Moses told Aaron of the word of God and the signs which he had seen, but regarding Aaron they are silent. The past was certainly not forgotten. The two no doubt were in Egypt more than in Midian. Those old altars where they first kindled the fires of love rebuild themselves, and for the time they were young again.

That meeting began a new chapter in the history of Israel. It was the preface of all that follows. Hesitation had become a thing of yesterday. When we meet Moses and Aaron again they are in the midst of a council of elders down in Egypt. This council was called for a specific purpose. It was no mob of wild insurgents, but a deliberative assembly. Aaron was the orator, and when the people had heard the words that God had spoken to Moses and had seen the signs "they bowed their heads and worshiped." Revolutions are of slow growth and there no doubt began to be a national unrest long before the coming of Moses. An agitator would have seized upon the moment and kindled the passion of the people into riot and death; but Moses was a believer in law. Moses and Aaron went from the council to Pharaoh and laid their credentials before him. The Lord God of Israel had said: "Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness." The request would seem to have been simple, but the king had probably heard of the council and was in no mood to listen. "Who is Jehovah, that I should hearken unto his voice to let Israel go? I know not Jehovah and, moreover, I will not let Israel go." That Pharaoh should recognize the God of the Hebrews was not possible. He himself had been exalted to the high plane of an Egyptian divinity. His answer sprang from pride and passion. The request was repeated in another form, but the king's rage was only increased. Moses and Aaron were accused of hindering the people at their work. "Get unto your burdens" came like the growl of a beast.

Israel Groans Under Oppression Without Prospect of Relief

The burdens were to be made the heavier and the workmen tortured as never before. Thus saith Pharaoh: "I will not give you straw. Go yourselves, get ye straw where ye can find it; for naught of your work shall be diminished." And the required number of bricks remained the same, while the people were scattered over the land to gather stubble instead of straw. The task was made impossible and still the lash fell upon the bare backs of the Israelites because the output of bricks was not the same as before. The whole land groaned by reason of its oppression, and no prospect of relief was in sight. God had inspired hope, but that hope seemed long in fulfillment, and hope deferred maketh the heart sick.

A condition followed that must have tested the lawgiver's faith to its limit. That Pharaoh would not grant his request he knew from God in the mount, but that his countrymen were to endure the greater suffering because of it was something for which he was not prepared.

The Israelites complained against their leader. One may endure the accusation of an enemy, but to be misunderstood by a friend is hard to bear. Moses went to God, as he had a right to go. "Lord, wherefore hast thou dealt ill with this people? Why is it that thou hast sent me? For since I came to Pharaoh to speak in thy name, he hath dealt ill with this people; neither hast thou delivered thy people at all." He made no complaint for himself, but every lash that fell upon his countrymen bit him to the very bone.

Promises of God Always Ripen Ultimately Into Fulfillment

The mission of Moses seemed a failure at the very outset. But he must learn to wait. One should not mistake a bend in the road for the end of the world. The conditions of the past are seldom reversed in a day. The promises of God ripen into their fulfillment. We become impatient and try to hasten God. We forget that he not only ordains the end but also the successive steps that lead to it. Though we may believe this to be true, however, it is difficult, sometimes, to live up to our belief. And yet the trend of events is ever that way. The thing that should be is the one that ultimately comes to pass. Nothing more fully illustrates this fact than the story of Israel. In the deep waters through which the children of Israel passed they felt first the sustaining hand of Providence.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—The ruler who loses his temper loses his throne. Great crises call for great leaders. Meekness is a better weapon than pride. Cruelty to the worker means danger to the state.

"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," is an old saying of the Greeks. And it is often quoted by the historian in describing the insane fury through which tyrants lose their crowns and by reason of which an enslaved people gain their freedom. An English statesman of today would hardly defend the course of the British parliament that resulted in the independence of the American colonies. When we read the story of the French revolution and the conditions which led to it, we wonder at the criminal folly of the reigning house. A modicum of kindness might have averted all the strife which deluged Europe with blood and outlined anew the map of the continent. Pharaoh came to grief in his attempt to thwart the purposes of Jehovah. The first lesson any of us needs to lay to heart from this paragraph is that "nothing is ever settled until it's settled right." "Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small."

It Takes a Great Courage to Meet a Great Emergency

Verse 1—"Afterwards" indicates that the interview Moses and Aaron had with their own people put new heart into them (ch. 4:29-31). Happy the minister who goes home from a congregational meeting heartened and not discouraged. We must remember that the ruler of Egypt was more autocratic than the late sultan of Turkey, and to propose to him a change of policy toward a subject race was to put one's head in the lion's mouth. Nothing so intoxicates a fool as power, or will more quickly lead to his downfall.

The plea that Moses made for a three days' holiday has been often criticised as a mode of deception close upon lying. But the simple fact is that Moses was using the common language of diplomacy. When the war between America and Great Britain was concluded by the treaty of Ghent in 1814 not a word was said about the question that brought on the fight and which disappeared with its close. Moses and Pharaoh perfectly understood one another, but it is not the way of a diplomat to ask an absolute monarch to yield, or the way of an absolute monarch to admit he must. A diplomat who is fit for his position knows how to "side step" the issue and yet accomplish the end designed.

Verse 2—It it usually found that the ruler who regards not man fears not God (Luke 18:2). Cruelty and impiety go together. Only the humane man is the humble man.

Verse 3—The request made in verse 1 is repeated with some amplification. There was no deceit, no intention to deceive, no possibility for deceit. If the prisoners in a penitentiary should ask for a three days' outing—being only one day off from a sea and a wilderness and a foreign country—their purpose to get out of reach would not need to be shouted through a megaphone. It would be written on the face of their request.

The Meek Inherit the Earth, but the Cruel Lose What They Have

Verse 4—The answer of Pharaoh ignored the request as the request ignored the real, the understood purpose. Pharaoh blurts out that Moses and his brother are making things worse by interfering. "Go and attend to your own business" is what Pharaoh says, and immediately he turns to put the screws on tighter.

Verse 5—Indeed the people of Israel were so numerous that their cessation from labor was as threatening in that day as a general strike would be in ours. If not forced back to work soon they would be hatching some sort of revolution; and accordingly Pharaoh commands the taskmasters to give them more to do, and to do it at once.

Verse 7—The common brick of that country was made of clay mixed with chopped straw. So made it is less likely to crumble. Thus we mix plaster with hair to "bind" it. Of course bricks, sun-dried bricks, without such a holding material would be constantly breaking and the clay would need to be wet and pressed anew. There being no wood or coal in the valley of the Nile, brick kilns like those in which we bake clay are not known. It is an interesting fact that bricks made without straw, or with stubble and reeds substituted for straw, have recently been found in that part of Egypt where the Israelites are believed to have lived and labored.

Verses 8-9—It would seem that the ruler had heretofore provided the necessary straw from the royal wheat fields. But now, to add to the cruel tasks of the Israelites, they were told to go into the fields and make the stubble left in the fields answer the purpose as best they might. It reminds us how one of the nobles of the court of France precipitated the conflict which resulted in the death of Louis XVI. and his queen by telling the poor (who complained that they were starving for lack of bread), "Go and eat grass."

Cruelty to the Working Classes Is Ruin to the State

Verse 10-12—We have grave reason to fear that the growing disregard of the Sabbath rest is undermining instead of buttressing prosperity and increase. Just as the labors of the Israelites were increased we see today tens of thousands of laborers who used to have a Sabbath rest now deprived of it. A minister recently said that there was hardly a young male member of his church who was free to go to church or rest at home on Sunday. Labors seem to have increased rather than diminished. The hours of the day may be shortened, but the number of workdays in the week has been increased in many instances from six to seven. For a while the people will groan. Sometime they may rise and sweep before them the cities they have builded by enforced toil. It is only the blind who refuse to read the lessons history has written first in the days of Moses, but repeated in many an age since.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning July 20, 1913

Topic—The unjust steward. Luke 16:1-8.

The broad meaning of the parable of the unjust steward is simply this, that the children of the light should be at least as shrewd in the improvement of their opportunities as are the children of the world; but the ends they seek will be heavenly, not earthly. The teaching is unusual, and largely on this account it has been perplexing to the commentators.

We recognize at once the fact that this sort of teaching was not frequent with Jesus. He did not lay his emphasis on the quality of prudence. But none the less this teaching, in its due proportions and its proper place, was necessary. The disciples were only too disposed to overlook the importance of prudential considerations. And we must not lose sight of the fact that this parable is addressed not to the mixed mulitude of sinners and Pharisees, as were the parables of grace of the preceding chapter, but to the circle of the disciples, to whom a fuller account of the conduct of the kingdom could be given.

There have been more interpretations offered for this parable than for any other. Some writers have found in it the story of a repentant steward, who, upon being discovered in his knavery, performed his first act of justice after his penitence by correcting the accounts of the debtors of his lord and remitting the amounts with which they had been extortionately charged. But this idea is contrary to the plain sense of the passage, and contains the insuperable objection that it makes the steward to steal not from his employer but from his employer's debtors. And there is another story of a just steward, unjustly charged, who became a rascal after he had already been condemned as one. But there is no hint in the text that the charge against the steward was not well founded, and the moral problem of the whole discourse is only complicated by this explanation.

The question as to whether the steward is justly accused or unjustly accused is immaterial to the idea of the parable. He is evidently regarded by his master as guilty, and for his guilt is about to be dismissed. This is the whole situation.

Here we have a steward of another kind than that of chapter 12:42. The latter was a slave. This one is a free man. He has been employed by a rich man to administer his estate and his rents. He has been so long in his office that he has become incapacitated for doing any other work. While he is alert of brain, he is soft of arm. When suddenly dismissed from his stewardship he is unable to dig, and he is ashamed to beg.

But the unjust steward is resourceful. His downfall was evidently unexpected, as was that of many another steward in a rich man's house in the Orient. In a society in which there was no bookkeeping he had been the trusted agent of his lord. With entire confidence he entered his master's presence, and in a moment he was humiliated. But he did not despair. Everything now depended on his keeping a cool head and acting quickly. He did not fail himself. His promptness was shown in his immediate gathering of his master's debtors together; his forcefulness in the authoritative way in which he bade each one of them sit down and falsify his acknowledgment of indebtedness, and imposed his bidding upon them; his astuteness in bringing them all into the same predicament, so that none of them would be in a position to turn informer against the others. And with all his bullying ways and flagrant rascality, he had a certain free-handed generosity in giving away the money he had stolen that made him a favorite among his master's clients. While in office he used his opportunities to make friends for himself among his master's people, so that when he should be out of office they would treat him kindly.

"His lord commended the unrighteous steward because he had done wisely." This Oriental master's anger blazed up quickly and fiercely, and soon subsided. After the gust of passion was passed he even took a kind of enjoyment in hearing about the cleverness of the rascal who had cheated him. It had its humorous side. To "do wisely" was to act shrewdly (compare Ex. 1:10).

What Jesus has to commend is not, of course, the rascality of the man, but his energy, his decision of character and his resourcefulness. The disciples of all ages have need to be resourceful, because Christ has sent us forth as sheep in the midst of wolves. And often the sheep and the wolf are both inside the same man.

The Christian should, least of all men, be controlled by circumstances; it is for him to control circumstances. He should bend them to his ends; for his ends are the highest. He should be so wise that he will see his opportunity as it swiftly approaches, and seize it ere it flies past. He should be so wise that he will use his temporal possessions to achieve an eternal good. And this point brings us to the climax of the parable.

It is true wisdom that we should so employ our temporal goods that, in the world beyond death, we may receive for them heavenly goods. For a human being, animated by an eternal soul, no temporal possession remains a thing of merely temporal significance. Our souls react upon our possessions. We must control our possessions, or else be controlled by them. And in so far as our souls control our possessions, our possessions help our souls and enrich them unto eternity.

He is a truly wise man who, as steward of a property which he cannot take with him out of this present life, and knowing that he is soon to surrender his stewardship, uses that property to make less rugged the path of the widows and the orphans; to help men released from prison into the liberty of a self-supporting manhood; to redeem the ignorant from vice and superstition by teaching them the truth; to abolish sickness and break the dread of death; to increase human joy and diminish human suffering; to promote peace and good will between different classes of society in his own land, and between nations; to proclaim to every sin-burdened soul in his own community, and to every unenlightened soul in every darkest heathen land, the unchanging love of God, the Father, the saving sacrifice of the Son, and the living fellowship of the divine Spirit. So to use the money he controls, before he renders up his stewardship, is the part of every wise man.

A MODERN EDUCATION

Topic — Missionary essentials, home and abroad. I. Information. Acts 15:12-18.

A far traveled American said recently, "If I could say a word to all students today, it would be to advise them to study chiefly history and literature. They must know the life of the race if they are to live wisely and effectively." He might have added, "And history should include our own times." For there are world movements afoot today which equal those of the age of the Cæsars and of Napoleon. The well educated person knows what is doing in his own day. And here enters a significant truth—the persons who are most alert to world tides of the present century are the students of missions. Take any normal group of men or women, and it will be found that those who best comprehend the meager dispatches from eastern Europe are familiar with missions. All that the press has had to say of late concerning China has been clearest to those persons who, from the missionary standpoint, have been studying China for years. The same is true with respect to present discussions of the Japanese. There has been a real education for multitudes of persons in the missionary meetings.

Nobody can understand missions on a purely sentimental basis. A body of actual information is essential.

Whoever possesses a fair and representative knowledge concerning Christian missions is sure to be an advocate of the enterprise.

Of the many-sided services which foreign missions have rendered to the homeland, none has been greater than the enlarging and vitalizing of the conception of patriotism. Canada has seen no more nationally useful event for a decade than the recent missionary congress in Toronto. Thousands of men in the southern states have caught their first real glimpse of America's character and destiny at the great missionary conventions. The best patriot is the least provincial—he understands the relation of his own land to the whole earth. The foreign missionary thus has been a minister to the best national spirit at home, as well as to the national prestige abroad.

Flour mills need grain, looms need thread and minds need themes for thought. Would it embarrass the average person if somebody with authority were suddenly to demand of him what material he has for profitable mental operations? Baseball is not an adequate grist for the mill of a man's mind; nor clothes for the brain of his sister. The trivialities of gossip, food and daily routine are, broadly speaking, wholly insufficient. If one's intellectual machinery is to do the work for which it is designed it must have something worth while to operate on; and something objective at that. Whither this thought leads is plain. The principles, the personalities and the performances of Christian missions are a vast and profitable subject for thought. They constitute, with their correlatives, an adequate life interest. They are broad and broadening; deep and deepening; high and heightening. They deliver from small-mindedness and expand one's intellectual horizon. Missions are a point of contact with all that makes earth and all that makes heaven.

To have great friends is inspiring. Most of us, however, cannot know in person lives which the world has acknowledged as great. Through biography this is possible. An intimate acquaintance with some of the heroes of missionary history is possible even to those persons who complain most about the narrowness of their lot.

Increasingly, missionary news gets on to the cables. Because it is not labeled "missions" some persons fail to recognize it. Thus, China's call for prayer was perhaps the most significant single piece of missionary intelligence that has come out of Asia within a century. The alert friends of missions will watch the daily press for "tidings from afar."

Profound truths may lurk beneath commonplace facts. Thus, the bare report of conversions to Christianity upon the mission field carries with it the tremendous principle that the gospel has power to overcome pagan faiths and to transform heathen lives. There is no greater wonder on earth than this. It vindicates the proposition that Christ is still alive in the spirits of men, and that he can make sinful men holy. Thus there is fresh vitalization for our dearest beliefs in the facts of missions.

All kinds of information—ethnic, political, social, economic, industrial—are wrapped up in the commonplace phrase, "missionary intelligence."

Both abroad and at home missionary information is what the topic calls an essential. The people to whom the gospel is carried need the knowledge contained in the Bible and in church history. The converts who stand unshakable are those who are grounded deeply in the truths of Scripture. News of present-day Christian progress promotes the solidarity of the church in the foreign field with the church in Christian lands.

MISSIONARY WORK

Another Call for Help from Siam

The great opportunity for evangelistic work following upon the heels of the recent malarial epidemic in Chieng Mai the missionaries there feel simply must be taken advantage of. At Ban Tah, an outstation of First church of Chieng Mai, 319 persons were baptized at the communion service in May. In the Chieng Mai station alone more than 2,300 people have become Christians since the epidemic began—also one new Christian for every $2 of the epidemic fund expenses. It is the judgment of the missionaries that the present rate of accessions could be multiplied several times at about the same relative cost.

But the epidemic fund is entirely exhausted, and unless more money is received promptly by cable the mission will be under the necessity of discharging most of its efficient evangelistic workers. Many of these helpers are men whom the missionaries wish to train in the new theological school. Funds may be sent through Dwight H. Day, treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions, 156 5th avenue, New York City.

Chinese Boy Students' Celebration

The boy students at Point Breeze Academy, Weihsien, in the province of Shantung, China, celebrated the formal recognition of the republic of China by America in the manner of schoolboys the world over. Professor Ralph C. Wells, the principal of the school, describes the celebration as follows:

"About half past 10 on the 2d of May we received a telegram from our American consul at Chefoo saying that the American government would recognize the Chinese republic that day. Our boys were just finishing their morning recess drill, so I stepped out and translated the message to them. A spontaneous shout went up from them, and a hearty clapping they gave. They proved themselves to be true schoolboys when they gave another cheer and more clapping when I announced that we would take a holiday the rest of the day. Almost immediately up went the five-colored flag of the republic, and they borrowed our large United States flag to put up over the school door. The news spread rapidly over the compound, and everywhere it was received enthusiastically. We sent a man post haste to the city for firecrackers, and just at 12 o'clock the boys gave some more rousing cheers for the republic of China and for its big friend, the United States of America. Then the sound of drums and bugles summoned us to the west side of the compound, where all the college students and professors were drawn up. Our boys, the girls' school and the Women's Bible Institute joined the assembly. The stars and stripes were floating from the college tower together with the Chinese flag. The Americans and English were in a little group in front of the students. Dr. Bergen, saluting the flags, called out, 'The republic of China!' At that we all responded, 'Ten thousand years! Ten thousand years! Ten thousand years!' The students replied with a similar cheer, followed by 'thirty thousand years more' for the American republic."

The next event of interest was the college field sports. Many visitors came to see these, among them seventy students from the government middle school at Ankui City, who marched from their institution in a body. These men remained at Weihsien over Sunday as the guests of the college boys, and this gave the college Y. M. C. A. a splendid opportunity to get on friendly terms with the government students. Many ladies of the high class families in the town also attended the sports, and as it was on a market day, and the athletic field lies between two main roads to the city, several thousand people witnessed the events. The Chinese seem to be able to get up a good deal of enthusiasm over athletics, although the sports are new to them.

The meet had a rather unusual effect on the Sunday services the next day. The Weihsien church, which seats about 700, is ordinarily packed to the doors, and in order to get the government students in a separate service had to be held for the girls and women in the girls' school building. But shortly before the service commenced the gateman came rushing to Dr. Wells in great consternation, saying that great crowds of women and girls were coming from the neighboring villages and there was no way to get them into the church. Most of these were spectators of the games the day before. By hard and hasty work the missionaries cleared out the desks in the academy assembly room and put in benches, and secured the pastor principal of the Ankui school to preach at this second overflow meeting. It took a great deal of persuasion on the part of the gateman, the Bible institute women and some of the foreigners to convince the unexpected visitors that "the side show" was just as good as the main performance, but they were all finally settled in the building. Dr. Wells adds, "I wonder if the field days of American colleges can show such results."

Chinese Women Gradually Changing

Miss Emma S. Boehne lately wrote from the capital of Shantung province: "Here in Tsinanfu there are several hundred girl students, where formerly not one could be found. On Sunday about 500 persons pack our chapel and at the same time in another building the children's service is also well attended. I have just returned from an itinerating trip, and found new inquirers and growth in the lives of the Christians. But there was only one little girl, of the hundreds of non-Christian women and girls whom I met, who had unbound feet. She lived near the home of a Christian who had influenced the parents not to bind her feet. Several years ago an old lady shut the door in our faces when her Christian son invited us to hold service in his home. Later the son's wife came to our woman's hospital here for treatment and was so pleased with what she saw and learned that on her return to her home the old lady's prejudice was broken, and last month she came five miles in one of their rough, clumsy carts to attend the services where I was holding a class. Later, when I visited her home, she welcomed us cordially."

Advice to Japanese from Greek Church

It has been the universal testimony of all missionaries in Japan that the Greek Orthodox Church in that empire, under the leadership of its first prelate, Archbishop Nicolai, took on an evangelical character very different from the formal ritualism that pervades the church in its centers of power in Russia. And that character seems to have survived the death of the venerable and much respected archbishop, if a recent number of The Greek Catholic Magazine of Japan is to be accepted as witness. A native Japanese priest of the Greek Church contributes to the magazine the following earnest and certainly evangelical insistence upon converted Christian character:

"In almost any church there are two or three 'old Adams' who hang back and hinder the work both directly and indirectly. Nowadays, everybody knows that Christians, severally and collectively, ought to be respected, but when outsiders find that the character of Christians has not changed for the better, and that their words and conduct are not different from their own, they can't help being disappointed. Moreover, when they attend church services only to find that the church's conversation and actions are of the ordinary type they finally come to doubt the transforming power of the gospel itself. Thus the minister's work is neutralized.

"Thus far Christians have shown themselves very apt in theological debate and resistance to persecution, but very deficient in real strength for ordinary living. The warrior who is able single-handed to meet a thousand foes in a religious war of words seems extremely inferior in daily conduct and ability to perform his social duties. From this fact results the error of identifying ceremonies with true worshp, people crossing themselves repeatedly without ever imagining that they ought to turn their hearts to God."

Expulsion Results in Conversions

At the Sangli Industrial School, in western India, one of the boys, a lad named Tatu, was recently expelled for a misdemeanor. He had received two warnings and punishments, but committed the offense a third time and had to be sent back to his village.

Tatu went back home, much as he disliked it, but he was too proud to return to the school and ask for readmission. But he kept on thinking, and later confessed that a voice kept speaking to him. Finally he realized it was God's voice calling him to service, and Tatu responded. He did not go back to school, but decided to stay where he was and use every influence to bring his friends in the village to Christ. He started a night school for his boy friends, got Bibles for them and taught them to read. Within a few months he appeared at the school with five of his young companions, all of them asking for baptism. That was six months ago. Now there are seven more people from that village asking for baptism, and among them are his father, mother, sister and wife.

In the village there are about 4,000 people. Tatu's influence is stirring the whole place. Perhaps the thing which has attracted most attention is the fact that neither he nor any of his Christian companions will work on the Sabbath. This sacrifice is a greater one than Americans can readily appreciate, but in India, where a day's wage is so small, every day counts. And with the earnings of a day every week to be counted at naught, the supplies from the bazar are lessened—and at best they are woefully scanty.

The boys of the Sangli Industrial School have done most of the carpentry on the new addition, while the masonry boys have done all of the cutting and laying of stone and plastering. The school is kept constantly busy turning out orders for brass and aluminum ware. The newest project of the institution is gardening and farming.

Missionary Brevities

—At Matsuyama, Japan, where Rev. J. C. Worley is missionary in charge, village work in the territory surrounding is conducted by deputations from the young men's society of the church. Six or seven of the members—men engaged in other occupations—are very faithful in this service, and supplement very strongly the work of the one native evangelist, who gives all of his time to assisting Mr. Worley. The Matsuyama church is prospering under the leadership of a strong native pastor, who cooperates heartily with the missionaries.

—Dr. C. T. Logan writes from Chengteh, China: "One of our cholera patients who recovered after two treatments, when he was considered dying by his Chinese family physician, came in a few days ago bringing a merchant from Kweichow province whom he had told of his treatment here. The merchant, a stranger to us, left a subscription of $50 gold for our hospital work."

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Board of the Northwest, Chicago, has had many reasons for rejoicing this year, and not the least has been the increase in subscriptions to the missionary magazines. Of the 200 gained on The Woman's Work list the honor belongs to just half of the twelve states in this territory, Iowa leading, followed by Nebraska, Michigan, Indiana, Minnesota and Wyoming. The 696 more copies of Over Sea and Land taken are divided among ten states, Iowa again carrying the banner. The increase in number of year books sold was much larger than in any previous year.

—The foreign missionary textbooks to be recommended to study classes during the coming season are "The King's Business," by Mrs. Paul W. Raymond, a study of increased efficiency for women's missionary societies; "The Emergency in China," by F. L. Hawkes Pott, D. D., and "Mexico Today," by Rev. E. B. Winton. Special leaders' helps for these books are being prepared and will be ready by Sept. 1. "Helps for Junior Leaders and Primary Class Teachers" (25 cents, postage 3 cents extra) is a book full of plans, programs, pictures and patterns adapted for younger children.

—The enrollment last year of organizations auxiliary to the Board of the Northwest showed a net increase, but the growth was wholly in those formed of young people, the Y. P. S. C. E., young women's societies, Westminster Guild chapters and circles and children's bands each numbering more than the year before.

NEW BOOKS

To real, throbbing life, God's disciplines, trials, privations, limitations, disappointments, are only preparations for a something of which it had not dreamed before.—Richard Sill Holmes.

A Novel That Is Worth While

V. V.'s Eyes, by Henry Sydnor Harrison. V. Vivian is a slum doctor; not the kind of man who preaches socialism and hesitates to practice it, but "a man in a patched coat whose power was only that he spoke simply of God, and believed in the goodness of his fellows." If you were destitute V. V. would take you into his office and give you—not a shabby old suit of clothes, but a brand new one, intimating that he had no use for such raiment, anyway, and was glad to fit you out with it. If you were sick you were made well again—without any charge. If you were a poor little factory girl striving with all your soul to be a "lady" you found that V. V. had already assumed you were one and treated you accordingly. This tall slum doctor with the trusting eyes gave his life away every day.

There was one thing that V. V. never hesitated to express his mind about—the cruelty of modern factory conditions. He wrote articles on the subject for the daily press, calling the factory owners by such mild epithets as "shameless homicides." And then when he finally formed a friendship with the charming daughter of one of the homicides—well, it was a big struggle for him. To tell any more would be to spoil the story; but one thing should be mentioned—the awakening of the charming daughter to V. V.'s point of view is one of the most beautiful things that we have read about lately.

Everyone likes a good story; and nearly everyone dislikes to wade through a turbid stream of problem novels and exaggerated detective "thrillers" and inane love escapades to find one that he pronounces really good. So that when a novel like "V. V.'s Eyes" is published the fact ought to be heralded far and wide, and all lovers of good fiction hasten to profit by the announcement. For this is a story in a thousand; it has all the elements that make a piece of fiction notable—charm, beauty, ideas, humor, skill, and a great humanity. It is written by the author of "Queed"; but wherein "Queed" was distinctive for a certain exaggerated cleverness, "V. V.'s Eyes" strikes a truer and more mature note, and marks its author as a man whose ideas are worth following.

One feels somehow like seeking out Mr. Harrison and telling him that his new book has in it an undying inspiration. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.35 net.

Biography and Reminiscences

The Inferno, by August Strindberg; translated by Claud Field. It is with something akin to shock and disgust that one greets Strindberg's autobiographical record, "The Inferno," when one's previous acquaintance with him has been confined to his better plays. There, cruel and disillusioned as he could be, one felt that it was the sane, calculating cruelty of the surgeon or the experimental physiologist. One shuddered, but one had to admire the coolness, the technique of the work. But surgeons, vivisectors or executioners are the last people on earth whom we can forgive for losing their nerve. If their work be tragic to begin with, their loss of nerve turns it into a degrading horror. And this is precisely what Strindberg has done, and what he has recorded in these pages. To describe his story in a review is impossible. It is a wild orgy of Swedenborgianism, mediæval demonism, omens, alchemy and a wild, despairing clutch at the protective obscurantism of the Catholic Church. If one-tenth of the book represents an actual record of experience it is an impressive warning against that oversubtlety of intellect and emotion and that estrangement from the common life which leads to lunacy. After reading these pages one sees the reason why such a mystic as Maeterlinck is so careful to keep close to mother earth, to farm, to eat large and unæsthetically substantial meals, and even to box occasionally. That is what Strindberg should have done. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

Life and Letters of James MacGregor, by Lady Frances Balfour. This is a record of a mighty ministry covering fifty-five years, forty of which were spent in the great mother church — St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh. Lady Frances Balfour is the daughter of one of the most intimate friends of "the doctor," and has given us an intimate book. It covers part of the period surveyed in Carnegie Simpson's life of Principal Rainy, but enters the scene from another angle, and needs to be read for a clear view of the whole situation. Dr. MacGregor was a Tory by tradition, by blood and by nature. He was a leader in the established section of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, and its moderator; a vigorous worker in opposition to disestablishment, a vital figure in the Church Defense League. In American ears it sounds strange to say that "the logical result of the principle that asserts there is no connection between the church and state is nothing but national irreligion—some would say national atheism," even though the speaker goes on to say that the next best thing to real connection is the attempt now being made in America "to see that God and the Christian religion should be recognized in the constitution of the United States." We can hardly understand the feeling that led to the saying, "Disestablishment means much more and much worse than the denationalizing of the church and state; it means the dechristianizing of the state. It means the destruction of national religion, and the dethronement of the Lord Jesus Christ as King and Lord of this land." Dr. MacGregor was always intense, as this would indicate, and always interesting. Many readers will be impressed by the frequent resemblances between him and Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, though the quotations do not suggest any other likeness than great intensity of conviction. We commend the volume to wide American reading. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $4 net.

Life of G. L. Wharton, by Mrs. Emma Richardson Wharton. This is a simple record of a noble life. Mr. Wharton was a member of the first group of missionaries sent to India by the Disciples of Christ, and became the real leader of the group. He spent twenty-four years in India, dying there before he was sixty. Mrs. Wharton has rendered a service to believers and all churches by this story of a life dearer to her than her own. [Fleming H. Inspirational Books

A Chain of Prayer Across the Ages, by Selina Fitzherbert Fox. This collection of short prayers from many sources makes a useful book, and will serve wide needs. There are morning prayers for twenty-two weeks, with a few evening prayers; then follow prayers for the seasons of the Christian year, missions, national needs, events in the home and a group for miscellaneous uses. The origin of all the prayers is given. Heads of homes will welcome it as a guide in family worship, and many ministers will find it helpful in preparation for public prayer. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $2 net.

The Broader Vision, by Richard Sill Holmes, editor of The Westminster and later corresponding editor of The Continent, is a collection of his short essays, taking its title from the initial sketch, a brief biography of Dr. Holmes written by his daughter. Her rapid characterization shows us how the broad vision came to Dr. Holmes from an unusually wide experience as teacher, business man, chautauqua lecturer and pastor. The book is especially valuable as embodying Dr. Holmes's views of such men as Stanley, Grenfell, Samuel H. Hadley, Grover Cleveland, Richard Watson Gilder and General Booth; and it offers besides forceful chapters on preaching, personal ideals, faith, nature and a score of subjects upon which the author talked and wrote with rare scholarship and inspiration. The latter half of the volume is devoted to his poetry and opens up a vista of charming lyrics, sonnets and anniversary poems. One may safely prophesy that this handsome little book will be eagerly sought by the multitude who hold Dr. Holmes in loving remembrance. [Westminster Press, Philadelphia. $1.

With You Always, by Courtenay H. Fenn. Dr. Fenn's "Over Against the Treasury" was a little book with a big message that got right to the heart of Christian men and their responsibilities as a part of the church to which has been committed the task of world evangelization. "With You Always" is in part a sequel and in part an expansion of its predecessor, which has enjoyed a large and growing circulation. In the interesting form of the story of a single church it makes very clear the fact that it is the diversion of the individual's thought, effort and money, not any impossibilities in conditions, that hinders; and in a very practical way it leads the reader to a realization of his own responsibility. As a means of developing greater consecration to the worldwide work of the church the book cannot be too highly commended. The pastor who reads it will not only profit by it himself, but will discover a way to get his men interested in missions as never before. [Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia. 50 cents net.

A Rainbow in the Rain, by Jean Carter Cochran. This dainty little volume, dedicated by Miss Cochran to the memory of her beloved sister-in-law, Mrs. James B. Cochran, "who gave her life to China," seems a beautiful blending of lessons drawn from her own life of invalidism and from the work of her brothers at Hwaiyuen, China. The thread of fancy on which these lessons are hung connects an affianced bride bearing the heartbreak of her lover's death in far-away China, and the Chinese boy whose life that lover died to save. Both are made to reveal through their letters heartening touches of the strength in Christ that makes the weakest of humanity strong. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York City.

The Gift of Suffering, by H. S. Hoffman. The meditations which constitute the substance of this little volume were occasioned by a period of illness during which Bishop Hoffman's thought was naturally fastened upon the problem of pain. His purpose in publishing his reflections is to communicate the sense of comfort and peace that came to him in his experience. He neither claims to give, nor does give, any startling discoveries or positive solutions of the mystery of evil, but his work abounds in fresh and helpful statements of the compensations accompanying suffering in the experience of the Christian believer. [Eaton and Mains, New York. 75 cents net.

How to Live the Christ Life, by Russell H. Conwell. Under this title are grouped fourteen sermons which, with simplicity and directness, give wholesome and helpful counsel for the building up of the spiritual life of the Christian. The sermon on amusements is a good illustration of Dr. Conwell's sane way of looking at things. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1 net.

Mistakes at Funerals

1. It is a mistake and a reproach to the living to tell them that "the good die young." The word of God and observation teach that they commonly live longer than the bad.

2. It is a mistake to tell people that "one thing is certain, we must all die." Enoch and Elijah did not die and a whole generation of saints will go without dying when the Lord comes, which may be at any moment.

3. It is a mistake to teach that a consecrated Christian needs any special spiritual preparation for death.

4. It is a mistake to call death an angel, and weave garlands for the king of terrors.

5. It is a mistake to construe a desire or willingness to die as implying a sure preparation. Suicides when sane are not prepared to die.

6. It is a mistake, bordering on necromancy or spiritualism, to tell people that the spirits of their departed friends are looking down upon them and perhaps acting as ministering spirits. Little is revealed of the intermediate state.

7. It is a mistake to lay much stress upon deathbed repentance. It is possible, as it was in the thief on the cross, but fearfully uncertain in most cases.

8. It is a mistake to teach that our friends are crowned at death. The body is not yet glorified and all the saints will be crowned together when the Lord comes in glory.

9. It is a gigantic mistake to regard death and the Lord's coming as the same event. A little study of the Word will show that no two events in all the prophetic future stand out in stronger contrast.

10. And finally, it is a mistake to occupy most of the time in eulogizing the dead beyond measure. A few kindly words are proper, but the main part of the funeral sermon should be gospel truth to comfort mourners and lead souls to Christ. E. P. MARVIN.

The Justice of Equal Suffrage

I read Alice Warner Jerome's article, and her reason for opposing woman suffrage seems to be that the majority of women do not desire the ballot. It is that very excuse of the antisuffragists that is causing the American women to march in parades and do the spectacular things they do. As a descendant of a revolutionary officer, I believe in the liberty our ancestors fought for. If married women are willing to be represented by their husbands that is their privilege, but surely the tax paying single women and widows should have a right to vote. It is not a question of whether the world would be better but a matter of simple justice. A true mother never neglects her child, and a woman who would neglect her family to vote would neglect it for society, the lodge and many other things.

Women who go from their parents' homes to the care and protection of a husband's home know nothing of how hard life is for orphan girls. God said man and woman should be "one flesh," not "one man." If a woman has stock in a bank or a corporation she can vote the same as a man. She mingles freely with them at lodges, church meetings, etc. My mother was a devoted Presbyterian, and every year she voted at the annual church meeting, and her advice was much sought after, yet a truer mother or more domestic never lived. A man needs a woman's cooperation in all walks of life. A few years ago the men of Nebraska passed a law giving a second wife less than the first, but any woman would know it is harder to raise another's children than your own. In foreign countries women can rule as queens—and yet men come here from those countries and oppose giving the ballot to women whose ancestors lived here for centuries. When the war of the rebellion was fought an amendment was immediately added to the constitution giving the vote to the negro, regardless of whether the world would be better, and now when the daughters of the men who so freely sacrificed their lives or health want the same right granted to them they must beg and plead and march in parades.

It seems to me the only proper way is to give the ballot to the women by adding an amendment to the constitution just as it was given to the negro fifty years ago. I believe, as a rule, the antisuffragists are women of leisure or married women who know little of what it means to be alone. I must pay taxes the same as my brothers, and in all business dealings must deal on an equality with men. Then why should I not vote? I believe if only one woman in the country wanted the vote it should be granted to her regardless of what any other woman wanted. ELLEN B. TAWNEY.

300,000 Hungarian Calvinists in America

Everyone knows there are thousands of Hungarians in America. And most everyone takes it for granted that they are all Roman Catholics. This impression is not founded on fact. Of the 1,000,000 Hungarians living under the stars and stripes more than 300,000 are Presbyterians of the Calvinistic stripe.

The Hungarian Church of Calvinistic confession has five synods and many presbyteries. For four centuries these people have heroically maintained their position, and are now protected and supported by the government. The Hungarians, or Magyars, in America are descendants of the heroes who fought and bled for liberty in Hungary. The civil and religious liberty of our land attracts them, and the race that produces such a character as Louis Kossuth ought to be welcomed. In both civil and religious creed they are our brethren, and have every right to claim Presbyterians as of the same household of faith. We as Presbyterians have the duty peculiarly incumbent upon us to take care of our brethren coming as strangers within our gates. We should be peculiarly watchful over them because we, or our fathers, came here under like conditions.

According to the latest official reports our Protestant denominations have only about eighty mission stations among the million Hungarians settled chiefly in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan. Unfortunately, the initial efforts are divided among three denominations, thirty of them being Presbyterian, twenty-nine American Reformed and twenty-two National Reformed.

The foreign problem is chiefly a problem of getting workers to reap the harvest. The supreme need is a suitable ministry. One of General Assembly's special committee on immigrant work after the first year's effort declared: Pennsylvania has spent $60,000 in work among foreigners, but it is all lost because we have not a suitable ministry." The committee imported a number of foreign-trained ministers, but they were not found suitable for our need.

After this experience it was thought best to prepare young men of foreign blood for the ministry here and let them absorb American ideas with their studies in American institutions. But it was found that foreign students ignorant of English could not take the regular courses, and further, that our regular theological seminaries were not planned in a way to provide academic and theological courses adapted to the peculiar needs of our foreign candidates.

The peculiarities of the case make necessary a special course of training in a school especially organized for foreign work. The success attending the work at Bloomfield and Dubuque Seminaries has blazed the way for our dealing with men of other races. Both these schools, organized especially for German work, have extended their scope to include young men of other races and are thus engaged in a work of incalculable importance. A. W. FISMER.

Tested by a Keen Edge

There is no better test of the real standing of a family or a society than the way in which it treats its dependent members and classes. Does it expose the weak to undue hardship because they are weak and cannot defend themselves? Does it deprive the unfortunates of those advantages which they are not able to claim for themselves? Does it grind out the souls and bodies of little children in the deadly machine of its avarice?

The keen edge of this test, however, cuts into the very life blood of the family and society, when it asks—How do you treat the aged and disabled? WHAT do you care and HOW do you care for those who have borne and are suffering for you and who are now laid aside by infirmity and old age?

Tested by this keen edge that strips away pretense and injustice and selfishness, modern civilization is determined not to be found wanting. There is a new day for the aged and disabled. Secular concerns without number are measuring up to the test. OLD AGE PENSIONS is the answer.

Why should the church lag behind and treat its aged and disabled servants in an un-Christian, not to say inhuman, way? The church is being tested by a keen edge. Will it be found wanting?

Louis H. Severance: An Appreciation

BY ARTHUR C. LUDLOW

THE LIFE and character of the late Elder Louis H. Severance taught inspiring lessons, especially to those who were fortunate enough to have enjoyed his ennobling friendship. Large capacity for work was his by nature, and notwithstanding formal retirement from official connection with corporate interests, indefatigable industry reached its climax of intensity only with the close of life. He was an illustration of the truth that successful administration of large enterprises depends greatly upon mastery of details. Napoleon wheeled legions into victorious warfare because he possessed minute knowledge of military equipment, even to the number of shoes and rations for his troops, and this Christian layman grounded success, in all his life's endeavors, upon persistent cultivation of microscopic accuracy.

This quality was strikingly exhibited at the time of the rebuilding of Wooster University. The campaign for $400,000 centered in Mr. Severance's Cleveland office, and after heroic effort victory was in sight. The day before the jubilee this enthusiastic friend of Wooster University commenced about 10 o'clock in the morning to total a duplicate account of pledges, but after an hour's patient figuring the large sum failed to balance by $10. Without a sign of impatience the auditing continued until noon. A relative, entering the office, suggested recess for lunch, but the invitation was declined by a kindly wave of the hand. Half an hour later the suggestion was renewed, but again refused. A third plea was made, but not until 3 o'clock, or after five hours of labor, did the seeker after accuracy drop his pencil and triumphantly exclaim, "I have it; come, let us go to lunch!"

When a young man Mr. Severance resided at Titusville, Pa., where he was in charge of a gas company. One day he stopped to pat approvingly the shoulder of a Swede digging in a trench. In after years this workman asked his superior what was spoken at the time of the incident, and the reply was, "Oh, I probably said, 'You are a good fellow and will make your way in this country.'" The trench digger did make his way, succeeding to the position of superintendency in course of time. Such was this Christian layman's helpful personal interest, that all who approved themselves unto him as faithful toilers discovered a natural bond of friendship. Most fitting was it that the active pallbearers at the funeral were men who had spent their early years in his business office.

Highly sensitive was Mr. Severance to the slightest spirit of injustice. When General Assembly met in New York City he left his hotel one afternoon in order to enjoy the Hudson river excursion planned for the ecclesiastical gathering. There was but little time to reach the boat, although not far distant, so a cabman was hailed. In reply to a query as to charges, the driver evidently noticing the urgent haste of the party asked twice the usual rate, and refused to alter, although rebuked. Whereupon Mr. Severance turned and said to his friend, "Let us run for the boat." He would have missed the afternoon's pleasure rather than suffer even minor extortion. Thus trained in a school of rigid toil, with remarkable mastery of detail, and keenly alive to the sense of injustice, this Christian character was also disciplined and doubtless enriched with a peculiar wealth of sympathy by repeated baptisms of affliction which during the more than three score and ten years came to test and purify.

With statesmanlike vision he was interested not only in comprehensive plans for foreign missionary campaigns but also in the needs of the most humble home missionary. Throughout the protracted tour of foreign lands he was welcomed by missionaries for the reason that he brought to bear upon their work an expert business mind, as well as kindly heart and generous hand. Much of the work inspected stood well the test of this investigator, and his visit proved a benediction. Many missionaries are aware that their letters were never in his estimation too long in detail, and that he delighted in such correspondence. On the other hand, when away from the city of his birth communications from this friend would frequently close with inquiry concerning the welfare of some country church connected with Cleveland Presbytery.

The death of a noted philanthropist is often interpreted as the loss of mere financial good to the church and humanitarian institutions, but the passing away of Elder Louis H. Severance means far more to those who were associated with him in religious endeavors. What they learned to value highest was his keen analytic commendation of their accomplishments for the Master, his wise counsel, so modestly imparted, and, last of all, his financial assistance. Others may take the place of this benefactor in the mere distribution of wealth, but it will require a layman of peculiarly large mental and spiritual mold to succeed him as a student of religious ways and means, and as a counselor in perplexities ever confronting earnest followers of Jesus Christ.

Church Takes Lead in Fourth of July Celebration

A Fourth of July celebration under the auspices of the churches, lodges, the school board and town council was instigated by the church at Mount Pleasant, Ohio. The pastor, Rev. P. E. Burtt, was appointed general chairman and a campaign of advertising was started which extended over a radius of a dozen miles. Hundreds of folk from surrounding country and the town assembled around the Friends' meeting house, an historic building at the edge of town, and there was a varied athletic program, with music by a band and an address by William Dixon, Jr., of Martins Ferry, clerk of Mount Pleasant church.

This is one of the indirect results of the country life institute held in the church the last of February, when Dr. S. E. Persons visited the community. It is an example of the leadership churches are able to assume in rural communities when the pastor and people have a vision of the possibilities.

Sermons Published in Paper

Through the friendship of the editor of a local paper the sermons of Rev. C. A. Harris of Frederick, Okla., are printed in The Leader. Mr. Harris is thus reaching a large and mixed class of people and has already seen results in the added interest on the part of Presbyterians over the whole county.

Churches of Another City Advertise

Through the efforts of the Clergy and Laity League the Protestant churches of the Bronx, a suburban district of New York City, have united in a cooperative effort to increase church attendance. Following the idea recommended by the publicity commission of the Men and Religion movement and adopted in Philadelphia, Baltimore and other cities a page is used, the top of which is a general statement urging people to go to church. Underneath are the names, locations and time of service of various churches arranged according to districts for the convenience of readers.

The success of the advertising campaigns in various cities the past winter makes it probable that many additional cities will take up this form of church work this fall.

Temperance Topics

—The Kansas City Star recently published a wet and dry map of Missouri which shows that only twenty-eight of the 114 counties of the states have saloons. In an article accompanying the map The Star says that local option elections held in Missouri since the first of the year indicate that the state is experiencing a dry wave that is surely driving out the saloons.

—An effort will be made on Nov. 9, designated as World's Temperance Sunday, to obtain 1,000,000 signers to a total abstinence pledge. An offer is being made by the Lincoln-Lee Legion of Westerville, Ohio, to supply free pledge cards and literature for this day. This is done under the auspices of the Anti-Saloon League, which for some time has been conducting a campaign of pledge signing. The united effort on this day will immediately precede the national Anti-Saloon League convention in Columbus Nov. 10-13.

—The saloon is the only business that is ashamed of its best customers.—American Issue.

—In the great state of Iowa there are only 700 saloons, says The American Issue, or but a few more than in Toledo, Ohio, and only one-third the number in the city of Cleveland. Only 136 Iowa municipalities permit open saloons. The number of grog shops in the state will be reduced under a recent law which permits but one saloon to each 1,000 of population.

—For four years Warren, Ohio, has had no saloons. The last year in which there were saloons in that town fifty-two permits for new dwellings were issued. But in 1912 the number of permits was 152. One savings bank increased its deposits during the four years the county was wet from $170,000 to $373,000.

During the four dry years the deposits increased from $373,000 to $968,000. Although the property values have increased since the county went dry, all but two of the twenty-five townships are paying less taxes than before. The county also paid $500 a year less on outside poor relief during dry time than when the saloons were in operation.

Pan-Presbyterian Council Echoes

in no uncertain tones against any tendency to weaken the evangelical note in Presbyterianism.

"Cakes and Tea" an Incidental Feature

After the formal opening in the old Cathedral church Principal Smith and the faculty of King's College gave a reception to the delegates; they were shown through the venerable buildings of this ancient college, and then were served with cakes and tea. That evening the lord provost of Aberdeen—who, by the way, is a Presbyterian elder and Sabbath school superintendent—with the city magistrates, gave a reception to the council in the art gallery. There was a speech of welcome from the lord provost and a response from the president of the council, and an especially fine musical program, and then the ladies served cakes and tea. Next day there was a reception and garden party at Banchory house, the home of Sir David Stewart and his lady. The grounds and gardens of the fine old estate are beautiful. There was speechmaking, a brass band, a band of kilted pipers; also cakes and tea. So it goes. These Aberdonians have been fairly surfeiting the delegates with attention and receptions—and with cakes and tea.

The most delightful affair of an entertainment kind, however, was a trip to Balmoral castle. The local committee provided a special train and took the delegates and their friends, to the number of 300 or more, forty miles up the beautiful valley of the Dee. There they were met by a dozen or more great tally-hos, and in these the drive of eight miles was made to the fine old castle in the Highlands, which was Queen Victoria's favorite residence. After wandering about the royal estate the company gathered in Crathie church, where the royal family worships when at Balmoral, and a short religious service was held. Then the crowd was conducted through the grounds about the manse, where there was more speechmaking, where the president of the council planted a tree as a memorial of the occasion and where the good mistress of the manse and the ladies of the parish served cakes and tea. It was a bright, sunny day, and the hills were gorgeous with the yellow broom against a dark background of heather. And old Lochnagar (pronunciation left to the reader's fancy) was capped with snow. In the exuberance of their gratitude the delegates were free to pronounce this Highland trip the most delightful excursion of their experience.

Question of "Authority" Stirs Discussion

Usually the sessions of the Pan-Presbyterian Council are very quiet. But at the first morning session of the Aberdeen council quite a refreshing breeze sprang up. The general topic at this session, or sederunt, as these Scotch folk call it, was "Authority in Matters of Faith." The authority of Christ, the authority of the Scriptures and the authority of Christian experience were the particular themes discussed by the three papers. The papers were of an exceedingly high order, but it seemed to some that the discussion of the authority of Christ and of the Scriptures made too much of the subjective element, made inner consciousness and personal experience figure rather too largely in the matter of authority. Thereupon that conservator of orthodoxy, John Fox, D. D., of New York, became stirred up. He rose and said some things—said them with vigor and force. He made a short but somewhat electric argument on the objective authority of Jesus Christ and of the Word. Things were interesting for a while, and, if one might judge by the weight of applause, it would appear that the council strongly favored the more conservative position.

Considerable interest was manifest also when the proposal of the American Episcopal Church for a world conference on faith and order came to be considered. The delegates from Scotland and Ireland were not familiar with the scope and aims of this proposed conference, and there was a disposition to count it hardly worth while to go into conference with Roman and Greek Catholics and all other Christian churches on the subjects of faith and order. It was agreed, however, that without expressing any judgment as to the wisdom of the proposed conference the council would submit the matter without prejudice to its constituent churches.

Sabbath School Work and Evangelism

This council has manifested an intense interest in Sabbath school and evangelistic work. An additional hour was set apart for a further discussion of the Sabbath school and its interests. The world's convention at Zurich, though it will be so much larger than this gathering, will not likely set any higher estimate upon the value of the Sabbath school and the importance of making it in the highest degree efficient.

The plan for a worldwide evangelistic movement also met with great favor. The council has agreed to send out to the churches a call for a year of intercession, beginning Oct. 1, 1914, for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit throughout the world in both home and foreign fields. Representatives from all the churches in the eastern section seem interested in the project no less than the men from the United States.

The invitation of the Presbyterian bodies in Pittsburg to hold the next council in that city has been accepted and a strong committee of Pittsburg men has been appointed to look after the local arrangements. It has been agreed that the next council be held in the latter part of September, and as the year 1917 will be the 400th anniversary of Martin Luther's revolt from the Catholic Church, it is probable that the work of the great German will receive a good deal of consideration in the program.

FOUND A WAY

To Be Clear of Coffee Troubles

"Husband and myself both had the coffee habit, and finally his stomach and kidneys got in such a bad condition that he was compelled to give up a good position that he had held for years. He was too sick to work. His skin was yellow and there didn't seem to be an organ in his body that was not affected.

"I told him I felt sure his sickness was due to coffee and after some discussion he decided to give it up.

"It was a struggle, because of the powerful habit. One day we heard about Postum and concluded to try it, and then it was easy to leave off coffee.

"His fearful headaches grew less frequent, his complexion began to clear, kidneys grew better, until at last he was a new man altogether, as a result of leaving off coffee and taking up Postum. Then I began to drink it too.

"Although I was never as bad off as my husband, I was always very nervous and never at any time very strong, only weighing 95 pounds before I began to use Postum. Now I weigh 115 pounds and can do as much work as anyone my size, I think."

Making the School Course Pay Doubly

Education counts doubly when there is wise and constant consideration of the student's individual qualities. The institution which provides for direct association between instructor and student deepens its influence and broadens its power. Correspondingly, there is greater responsibility for the high character of the faculty. Our instructors are selected with this fact in mind. There are many advantages, too, in an institution which attracts students of like ideals from various sections. Ward-Belmont, Nashville's delightful school for young women, aims to give to each girl not only the best cultural associations but just the kind and amount of work suited to her individual capacity with due regard to her health. There is an average of one resident teacher for each ten resident students. Thorough education, rather than many things partially learned, is held as the ideal for life preparation.

Your daughter should come out of school with health improved, not shattered by overstudy or lack of physical care. Judicious watch is maintained over all students of Ward-Belmont. Though plenty of properly vigorous recreation is provided, the young women are permitted to do nothing which will injure their health. Rowing, swimming and horseback riding are among the most delightful recreations.

Courses are given in English, literature, history, mathematics, natural science, ancient and modern languages, music, drawing, painting, sketching, modeling, domestic science and related subjects. give too much time to apologetics and not enough to dynamics and constructive work called forth a vigorous defense from the theological professors. They cited Paul as a teacher who gave a good deal of attention to apologetics. They declared that they did not instruct their students to preach always on the destructive criticism but sought to have them fully informed as to the trend of modern thought, so that they might counteract what is false and dangerous in it. The seminary men were strongly supported by Dr. Zwemer, the missionary among the Mohammedans, who showed how essential it is for the missionaries to be thoroughly familiar with the subtle philosophies not only of the East but of Germany also.

The address of J. Wallace Williamson, D. D., of Edinburgh on "The Church and the Brotherhood of Humanity" was a very remarkable one. The paper on "The Cross and Present-Day Religion," by Professor H. R. Mackintosh, D. D., of Edinburgh, was also of a very high order. The paper of Dr. Vollmer of Dayton, Ohio, on "The Heidelberg Catechism," and the paper on the "Westminster Catechism," by Dr. Henry Cowan of Aberdeen, are deserving of wide circulation. The address of Dr. James Stalker of Aberdeen on "The Problems of Social Life in the Eastern Section" was regarded by the delegates as one of the most remarkable addresses to which they had ever listened.

Aberdeen, like other Scotch cities, is a great churchgoing place. The streets at the hour for morning service were a sight good to see. The pulpits of the city were mostly occupied by the American and Irish delegates. All things considered, this council will rank as one of the best that have been held.

She lifted her head slowly and gazed at him sorrowfully.

"And you could write about your poor old mother like that, Martin? Why, you've put me in just like I am—it's like a photygraph without the lines taken out. You might 've tried to touch me up a little bit—you showed me off in my old clothes just a-scrimpin' and dodderin' around the garden and lookin' after your pa. And, oh, Martin, how could you speak of your pa's faults so plain? Couldn't you have made him out the way he'd been if things just hadn't been agin him so?"

"Don't you see, mother, I had to put you in like that?" explained Martin desperately. "It's because you are like you are that you could go into a story. If I had touched you up I would have spoiled the whole thing. The story wouldn't have sold at all. It's the naturalness of it that took the editor's fancy. Once you said, mother, that you were willing to stand anything in the world if it just meant saving our home. Aren't you willing to stand a picture of yourself for that? You see, I wrote the stories for the mortgage. Here are two checks for Mr. Ripley when he comes this morning, and there are more to follow as soon as I can do the work. The editor wants a series of these character stories. We won't worry about the foreclosure, for there's a year for redemption. I've found out something I can do now. We'll see what my mortgaged brains can accomplish in a year and how fast my stiffened-up fingers can write. Making allowance for a lot of work that may not count, in that time I guess I can knock the breath out of the mortgage all right if you'll just let me put you in some more stories."

Trembling, his mother read the amount of the checks which Martin put into her hands.

"Do you mean, Martin, that they gave you this money for writing about me—just poor old me?"

Martin nodded.

"And more for the next ones, if they're as good. I can write a rattling good story about how you made Parson Dolliver take back what he said about father's being a backslider and got him to preach the funeral the way you wanted it."

"Why, Martin—Martin!" she cried aghast, "I couldn't ever let you do that! You mustn't write any more stories at all—I can't give in to it—I just can't——"

"How can we manage any other way?" questioned Martin slowly. "Look out at the asters in the garden, mother, and see if you can't make up your mind to the thing."

Mrs. Kenzie gazed long at the asters, lavender and white, adazzle with dew, and sighed deeply. Her struggle was hard.

"It would be terr'ble to give up the garden—just terr'ble," she said finally, "and if you'll promise"—she came to the bed and paused solemnly—"if you'll give me your word, Martin, not to say anythin' about what a hard time I used to have gettin' your pa to take a bath, and promise not to tell that he swore on Sundays, I'll give in. I can stand it for myself—but your poor pa——"

The fledgling writer crinkled his forehead.

"That's good material, mother—all these little things count toward making a story sell. Do say I can write anything I choose——"

There was a knock at the door. Mrs. Kenzie peered out the window.

"It's Mr. Ripley," she announced, straightening her collar and smoothing her hair. "Well, I reckon I'll have to give in, Martin. It's jes' like an auction—everything's got to go, no matter what I'd like to keep back. But there's another side to it—I can get considerable satisfaction out o' tellin' Mr. Ripley I didn't make no mistake takin' a mortgage on your brains. You must be terr'ble smart, Martin—smarter even than I counted on—to make money out of your good-for-nothin' old ma."

"Don't ever call yourself that again, best mother in the world!" cried Martin passionately. "Can't you see that you're the one that is worth something? I don't count at all. I couldn't have accomplished anything at all if it hadn't been for you. And mother, people like to read about you not to make fun of you but because they love you——"

"How you do talk, Martin!" scoffed Mrs. Kenzie, trying to frown, but revealing by a laugh how near she was to complete capitulation.

With eyes alight Martin noted that there was a return of something of her old buoyancy in her step as she marched to the door with the checks in her hand.

She paused with one hand upon the doorknob and bent her head for a moment.

"Don't forget, mother," interrupted Martin softly, "don't forget to add thanks that you haven't lived all your life yet. For the rest of your days you are going to be coddled—do you hear, mother—coddled!"

Brotherhood Secretary Getty Resigns

Rev. Walter Getty, general secretary of the Presbyterian Brotherhood of America, has resigned. He left Chicago last week to fill a number of engagements at summer conferences. The associate secretaries, Doctors J. T. Henderson and Francis M. Fox, are dividing the work pending the selection of a chairman of Assembly's committee on the brotherhood.

Mr. Getty, who is a United Presbyterian, came to this work to give temporary aid some time after the death of Secretary Rosenear. His efficient services have been invaluable in forwarding the work of the organization, and he has made a host of personal friends among Presbyterian men.

Deplore Death of L. H. Severance

The board of trustees of the University of Wooster in special session July 8 adopted resolutions recounting the connection of Louis H. Severance with the institution. His beneficence to the university following the fire and his leadership as president of the trustees, as well as his never failing interest and enthusiasm concerning the work of the institution, were set forth.

The Presbyterian Ministers' Club of Cleveland also adopted resolutions telling the work of Mr. Severance as a layman, especially in the fields of education and foreign missions.

Raise Potatoes for Church

In the irrigated section of Wyoming there are four acres of potatoes growing for a new building for the congregation at Orin, which has recently been organized by Rev. L. Harold Forde, pastor-evangelist. The new church was formed with eleven members, one of whom expects to enter the ministry. One man gave the land for the potatoes, another furnished the water and the people brought the seed. Rev. G. W. Campbell, who has charge of several missions, oversees this young church.

Reorganize Social Service Union

Pittsburg Plans Definite Work Through the Churches—New Secretary of Church Erection Board Resigns from Pastorate.

PITTSBURG—At the union ministerial meeting July 7 plans were adopted looking to the reorganization of the social service union of the city. The controlling body of the new organization is to be a committee of twenty-five, thirteen of whom are to be ministers, elected by the Union Ministerial Association. The social union proposes, if possible, to employ a paid secretary, make a survey of the city and bring existing conditions to the attention of all good citizens. The union recognized the Pittsburg evangelistic committee as its agency in evangelistic work, and the Lord's Day Alliance as its agency in securing better Sabbath observance. This body was instructed to protest against the city holding park concerts on Sunday evenings at the hour for church service.

The Pittsburg evangelistic committee has begun its summer work. Evangelist B. F. Schultz is holding noonday meetings every day in the downtown section. Park services are being carried on and vacation Bible schools are being held at five points.

The Welsh eisteddfod, held in Pittsburg the first week in July, attracted upwards of 50,000 people and was said to be the best in the history of the institution. The Welsh singers and ministers participated in a number of religious services. A union service was held in the Liberty theater Sunday afternoon, July 6, in which four congregations joined.

Pittsburg is to have the opportunity of hearing a number of noted preachers during the vacation of pastors. Third church, Dr. W. L. McEwan pastor, has announced the following supplies: Dr. W. W. Moore, president of Richmond Theological Seminary; Sir William Ramsay of Aberdeen, Scotland; Dr. John Thomas, Liverpool, England; Dr. George N. Luccock, Chicago; Dr. John B. Laird, Philadelphia; Dr. J. Ross Stevenson, Baltimore; Dr. S. S. Palmer, Columbus, Ohio, and Rev. H. D. Lindsay, Pittsburg. Second church, Dr. George B. Shelton pastor: Dr. J. R. Henry, West Bridgewater, Pa.; Dr. S. Edward Young, Brooklyn; Dr. Ira Landrith, Nashville, Tenn.; Dr. Hugh Black, New York; Dr. R. J. Patterson, Belfast, Ireland, and Dr. R. A. Torrey.

Dr. Jesse Bruce, the newly elected field secretary of the Board of Church Erection, presented his resignation to First church of Crafton July 6 and a meeting of presbytery has been called for July 21 to release him from the pastorate. Dr. Bruce is one of Pittsburg's well known ministers. He has served the first church of Crafton for more than ten years, and previous to that held the pastorate of Westminster church, North side, for a number of years. It has not been definitely decided whether Dr. Bruce will live in New York, Pittsburg or Chicago.

Word was received in Pittsburg last week of the death of Mrs. Minnie M. Wiley at Clifton Springs, N. Y. Mrs. Wiley had been with her husband on the mission field in India for the past thirteen years and was supported by Edgewood church. P. W. SNYDER.

Keep Children Off the Streets

Expect 2,500 Boys and Girls at St. Louis Summer Bible Schools—Free Boat Trip Planned by City for Youngsters.

ST. LOUIS—The vacation schools, twelve in number, which opened June 30 are in charge of Rev. W. Clyde Smith and Rev. George J. Searles. The leaders are sanguine in their anticipation of an attendance of 2,500. A parade was made by the Markham school the first week, and each school will make a similar parade some time during the summer sessions. In the parade the boys carry hammocks and the girls sew garments. Mr. Smith will edit a paper in the interest of the schools called The Vacation School Messenger. The Bible is taught daily, also manual arts, and much time is given to singing and marching. The motto of the schools is "Keep the children off the streets."

The public recreation commission has planned a series of fourteen municipal free boat excursions for children this summer. Each public playground will have an excursion day. The children will be taken from the playground of their district to the boat in automobiles and street cars. Business houses will donate goodies for the little folks.

H. H. Gregg, D. D., of Washington and Compton Avenue church will conduct special Bible studies at the Presbyterian Bible conference at Hollister, Mo., Aug. 7 to 16.

Dr. S. C. Palmer, pastor in charge at Second church, recently held a service at Niedringhaus mission, now supported by Second church, at which he baptized nine babies. A vacation school and Sunday school are being maintained during the summer.

Clayton church building was sold last month for $5,000. A new building is to be erected on a lot purchased by the church about a year ago. Plans have not yet been accepted for the new building, and for the present the congregation will worship in the old church, which has been leased from the purchaser.

Gain Less than Five a Year

Congregations Advance Slowly in Last Seven Years—Sunday Schools Show Good Increase—C. E. Convention in 1915 at Chicago.

CHICAGO—Although there has been a falling off of a total of 569 members in the Chicago churches as reported to presbytery in 1913 over the number recorded in 1912, the average church membership is 307.5 for the 102 churches reporting. This compares with 274.4 as the average membership in 1906. Thus each church during the last seven years has had an average annual gain of less than five members. The total membership now is 31,376. There are 31,001 pupils in Sunday school compared with 30,406 a year ago. The change in rank of the local churches, so far as their membership goes, during the last seven years is interesting. The churches in 1906 ranked as follows:

	Church.	Sunday school.
Third	1,371	2,025
Forty-First Street	1,270	1,294
Second	1,200	1,224
Evanston First	952	594
Hyde Park	871	566
Englewood	836	495
Woodlawn Park	827	978

There have been a number of changes from 1906 to 1913. The following table shows the rank of churches according to the latest reports:

	Church.	Sunday school.
First *	1,265	1,100
Second	1,256	497
Fourth	1,112	378
Oak Park First	1,049	680
Third	988	848
Evanston First	938	884

Fourth church seven years ago ranked thirteenth as to membership and Third church, which seven years ago was first, is now fifth. According to the rank as to membership in the Sunday school Olivet Memorial and First come first, with 1,100, then follow Woodlawn, Fullerton Avenue, Evanston First, Hyde Park and Oak Park First.

The recently completed survey of the neighborhood of Sixth church, Rev. G. K. Newell pastor, shows that 95 per cent of the people of the neighborhood have had Christian upbringing. The typical family consists of two parents from 22 to 40 years old, with one child under 15 years, and perhaps a roomer, living in a five-room flat. The average number of children per family is less than one, and very few of the young people live at home after they are 18 years old. Practically all of the families visited were sympathetic and often profuse in apologies for not having attended church. Many expressed willingness to ally themselves with the organization. It is probable that the church will make a strong effort the coming year to provide for the young people of the neighborhood certain classes and entertainments which are usually furnished by a branch of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. The shifting character of Chicago population has shown that the percentage of families moving into the neighborhood on May 1 was in some cases as high as thirty-five.

Through the gift of a friend of the church the young people of Austin church are to have shower baths added to the gymnasium equipment. The baths will be put in at once for the use of young men during the summer, arrangements being made so that the fixtures can be used in a new portion of the church which may be needed soon for the enlarging work among young people. Boy Scouts of this church are being sent by the men to the Boy Scout camp in Michigan for vacation.

ENDEAVORERS COME TO CHICAGO

Christian Endeavor delegates from Illinois achieved their wish by winning the next session of the international convention, that of 1915. The local leaders made an earnest effort to obtain the convention for Chicago and succeeded in getting it against the invitations of Toronto and Winnipeg. Chicago sent a large delegation of young people to Los Angeles to attend the gathering which recently adjourned.

Pupils in Evanston First church Bible school who left the city for their vacation before the end of the last quarter sent the required work of the school by mail to their teachers in order to maintain their good record in the class.

Ninth church Sunday occupied its recently redecorated auditorium and received a large number of members from the Christian Endeavor society, which is said to be the largest such organization in the city. A. D. Dewey is acting pastor.

Mrs. Margaret A. Belden, wife of Rev. Luther M. Belden, well known in Chicago Presbytery, died July 12. She was born in Newcastle, Ohio, in 1837.

Buying Real Food

Asking for Food in Terms of Calories or Proteids in the Modern Grocery Store Would Be Followed by Curious Results

Suppose a woman should enter a modern grocery store and say to one of the clerks, "I want thirty-five hundred calories in meat, fifteen hundred calories in vegetables and two thousand calories in cereals"?

Or suppose she asked the clerk to give her food containing 13.8 per cent proteid, 71.9 per cent carbohydrates, 1.9 per cent fat and 2.1 per cent mineral matter. Either request would throw the clerk into a condition of speechless amazement.

As a matter of fact, such an inquiry would represent a knowledge of food value and chemical content which is so far ahead of our times that the customer could not hope to get any intelligent response to her inquiry.

It has been estimated that a hard-working laboring man requires three thousand five hundred calories and 125 grains of proteid daily in his diet in order to replace the tissues that are destroyed by the wear and tear of his daily vocation. Having ascertained the requirements of the human body, the question naturally arises, "What is the most perfect fuel to keep this human engine in good running order and at the same time enable it to rebuild itself constantly from day to day?" The experience of four thousand years has confirmed the fact that the whole wheat grain perfectly fulfills all these requirements—in fact it is without doubt the most perfect food given to man.

Having come to this agreement, the question naturally arises, "How should this whole wheat grain be prepared for the human stomach in order to insure its complete digestion?" It is believed by many that the shredding process by which shredded wheat biscuits are made is the most perfect process for making the whole wheat grain digestible. In this process the whole wheat grains are steam cooked until the starch cells in the grain are completely broken down and rendered soluble. The cooked grains are then drawn out into thin, porou shreds, and these shreds are then formed into biscuits, or "little loaves," and baked crisp and brown in coal-fire ovens. This not only partially dextrinizes the starch but makes the shreds so crisp that one has to chew them very thoroughly before he can swallow them. Thi chewing process thoroughly insalivates the shreds, which is the first process in digestion.

Two of these biscuits, eaten with plain milk or cream, or with fresh fruits, will supply all the nutriment needed for a half day's work or play.

Had First Religious Structure

Anniversary of Indianapolis Church—Federation Plans Aggressive Activity—Unique Pulpit Attack on Lax Law Enforcement.

INDIANAPOLIS—July 6 First church celebrated the ninetieth anniversary of its organization. In the anniversary sermon by Dr. M. L. Haines, who is in his twenty-ninth year with this congregation, it was stated that this church erected the first building for religious purposes in the community. Including the present structure, there have been four church homes. The first preacher was David C. Proctor, sent out by the Connecticut Missionary Society, and the salary was $400 a year. Rev. Louis W. Sherwin has just completed his first year as assistant pastor.

The federation of Protestant churches now has an executive secretary, Rev. M. C. Pearson, late pastor of the Friends' church. He has been active as pastor in all civic union movements.

Law enforcement was given a vivid object lesson by contrast, in the pulpits of Shelbyville lately, where the same sermon was presented simultaneously by each minister on the theme, "Who Killed Barrett?" the subject of the tragedy being a product of the city saloons who was found dead in a neglected stairway.

The 100th anniversary of the birth of Henry Ward Beecher was recognized by The News with interesting photographs of the early Indiana churches served by that great preacher, who spent eight years in this city as pastor of Second church. The occasion was noted from a number of pulpits likewise.

At the late meeting of presbytery David Van Dyke, D. D., pastor of Sixth church, signified his intention to retire in September on account of declining health. He has spent three years here and has been in the active ministry over fifty-one years.

The preacher at the summer camp of Indianapolis Boy Scouts at St. Paul was F. O. Ballard, D. D., of Memorial church.

At a special missionary meeting at Tabernacle church the speakers were Samuel Martinez of Spain, a student of Moody Institute, and J. Luis Santiago of New York, who goes as a missionary to Porto Rico.

July 9 was dedicated the $100,000 colored Y. M. C. A. building, one of the Rosenwald benefactions, in which many of our leading citizens are also interested. The principal address was by Booker T. Washington, who was introduced by Charles W. Fairbanks. Among the numerous visiting participants in the exercises was International Secretary Moreland.

The Irvington congregation has united with other churches of that suburb in a union Sunday evening service for the summer. The decease of Elder J. G. Kingsbury of this session is regarded as a severe loss by many. One of the new elders, L. H. Dirks, formerly of Seventh church, participated in the "symposium on men's work" at the latter on Sunday evening. This was one number in the "chautauqua program" for summer evening services planned by the pastor, Rev. Claude R. Shaver.

Awaken Bible Interest by Parade

Sunday School Hosts to Be Marshaled in Line—Dr. J. B. Reeve Retires—Offer to Be Evangelists Without Pay.

PHILADELPHIA—Plans are being consummated by the Philadelphia County Sunday School Association for a monster parade the coming fall. It is hoped to have the effect of awakening greater interest in the effort to reach the 70,000 boys and girls that are said not to be enrolled in any Sunday school.

Second Italian church is making commendable progress. It owes much of its success to A. A. Scott, superintendent of its Sunday school. The membership is 126. There are 204 in the Sunday school.

Philadelphia North Presbytery was entertained at its July bimonthly meeting by the youngest church of the body, that at Logan, Rev. M. S. Bush pastor. Its growth since organized a few years ago has been most encouraging.

By the will of the late Mrs. Jane McKee Norris the Presbyterian hospital is left $50,000 and the ladies' aid society of the hospital $5,000.

At the recent twelfth anniversary celebration of the Lemon Hill Evangelistic Association the evening sermon was preached by Dr. Horace C. Stanton, formerly pastor of First church of Kansas City.

Among those recently receiving the degree of D. D., are Rev. S. S. Aikman, evangelist of Philadelphia Presbytery, and Rev. I. Mench Chambers of Merchantville, N. J., moderator of the Synod of New Jersey.

At a mass meeting in Berean church (colored), Dr. Matthew Anderson pastor, a woman's suffrage society was organized. The principal speaker advocated the appointment of policewomen.

ELECT DR. JARVIS MODERATOR

Philadelphia Presbytery at the July meeting in Chambers-Wylie church elected Dr. R. E. L. Jarvis of Bethany church moderator for six months. The call of Green Hill church for the pastoral services of Rev. Royal A. Stout, a Reformed minister of Plainfield, N. J., was approved. The pastoral relation of Dr. C. A. R. Janvier with Hollond Memorial church was dissolved, as also that of Dr. J. B. Reeve with Lombard Street Central church. He was made pastor emeritus and placed on the honorably retired list. Dr. Reeve was the oldest settled pastor in Philadelphia, having been installed fifty-two years ago, Rev. Albert Barnes giving him a charge. He is doubtless the oldest colored minister on the roll of General Assembly, being in his eighty-second year. Presbytery by a rising vote adopted a minute appreciative of his character and work.

Fifteen Presbyterian ministers of the city agreed to preach the first week of the tent and open air evangelistic services without compensation. Among the vacation Bible schools carried on by the committee seventeen are for Italian children, eleven for Hebrew and seven for colored.

New Church in Growing Section

Dallas Building Cost $15,000—Central Church Remains Downtown—May Invite "Billy" Sunday—Methodists Are Successful.

DALLAS—Exposition Park church dedicated its new $15,000 building July 6. Located in a rapidly growing part of Dallas, it promises a rapid growth under Rev. George S. Fulcher.

The Presbyterian mission, supported by the ten churches of the two Assemblies, has sold its lot and is to remove to a needy section of the city. The last superintendent, Rev. James Compson, now in England, is being considered again for the head of the establishment.

Central church consummated its deal by which its property was sold. It will remain a downtown church, close to the very heart of the city. It has engaged an architect and has a committee that will study with him the latest plans of churches. It is the purpose of the organization to build a working plant soon.

Rev. G. W. Benn, who has been the efficient secretary of the committee of one hundred which represents the cooperating churches of the city, is now giving half his time to Colonial Hill church. At the last meeting of the committee the question of inviting Rev. William A. Sunday to hold a revival in Dallas was temporarily postponed. There is a growing sentiment in favor of bringing Mr. Sunday here, if possible, under the most favorable conditions, hence the desire for a most hearty union effort before the invitation is pressed.

The Methodist Church, South, has just finished a remarkable canvass for the Southern Methodist University, which it is establishing here. The city gave the institution $400,000. Then an individual added to the city's offer a tract of land worth nearly a million more. Then the Rockefeller board offered the school $200,000 endowment if the church would raise $500,000. When the campaign was closed June 30 the committee found itself on the safe side by nearly $50,000. Dallas hall, the first of the university buildings, costing $500,000, is now far advanced toward completion. A $125,000 dormitory for young men is going up rapidly. For a school to spring up in a few months and start with nearly, or quite, $2,000,000 of assets promises much for the great church behind it. The opening of the school will take place in 1914. The agents of the institution report that nearly a thousand students were ready to enter when it was thought that the opening could be had in 1913.

Efficiency is one of the slogans of the times.

Several generations have concerned themselves with mechanical efficiency. The results are enormous.

Our generation is concerning itself with human efficiency.

Great industrial institutions are paying big salaries to "efficiency experts," whose task it is to organize and promote the human as well as mechanical efficiency of the business.

The worth-while efficiency expert doesn't try to run the business—he cooperates with its head and helps carry out agreed-upon plans, bringing thereto trained powers and familiarity with methods.

Most Presbyterian pastors are themselves experts, but every Presbyterian Church of 500 or more members needs a lay expert as pastor's helper.

The preparation of such efficiency experts is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago

Butlers Study Bible by Mail

Young Men at Summer Resorts Keep Interest in Church Class—Successful Work Among Southern Negroes.

NEW YORK—One of the most faithful Sunday school classes of Madison Avenue church is the men's afternoon Bible class, composed of about twenty young men, all of whom are employed as butlers. As the vacation season scatters them an arrangement has been made to conduct a correspondence Bible class, by which questions are sent to members, who return their answers to the teacher in charge. By this novel method men in Bar Harbor, in New London, Conn., in various seashore and mountain resorts, even those abroad, are enabled to continue their Bible studies under personal supervision and direction. Meanwhile, at home the church maintains several roof garden classes, meeting on the roof of the parish house, one on Sunday preceding the morning service and a young women's class on a weekday evening.

C. LeRoy Butler, D. D., the colored evangelist of New York City, has just returned from an extended tour of the southern states, where he has conducted meetings. He spent six months in the field, traveling over 4,100 miles and visiting fourteen churches, spending from seven to ten days in a place. This was a banner year for the churches under the care of the Board of Freedmen so far as concerns additions to membership, and Dr. Butler's assistance had doubtless much to do with this increase. About two-thirds of the persons who joined the churches were men.

Rev. John McNeill, the Scottish preacher who is supplying the pulpit of Central church during July, was formerly pastor of Regent Square church, London, when it was the cathedral of London Presbyterianism. Mr. McNeill conducted services in Chicago in 1893 for six months upon invitation of D. L. Moody. He is now pastor of Cooke's church, Toronto, where he preaches to congregations which average from 1,800 to 2,300, while on Tuesdays he holds a noon meeting attended by 1,500 persons, 90 per cent of whom are men.

It is understood now that Dr. Campbell Morgan has definitely declined the call extended by Madison Avenue Reformed church. A committee of three went to London recently to place before Dr. Morgan a unanimous call to become pastor of the church. Dr. Morgan held his decision in abeyance. On two previous occasions a call by the same church has been extended to the London pastor.

HOLD MEETINGS IN 164 CENTERS

The schedule of the evangelistic committee of the city now shows 164 centers of tent, open air or shop work. Noon meetings are held every weekday except Saturday on Wall street and in Bowling Green. Nearly every street corner in certain sections of the city at evening has its group of men and women singing, praying and exhorting. Among the young men active in this work are Kemper McComb of Hoddonfield, N. J., a graduate of Lafayette College, now a student at Bible Teachers' Training School, and E. P. Hains, Jr., of Newark, a Mount Hermon boy and a graduate of Bible Teachers' Training school. In the tent at 67th street and Avenue A there are now being held services for Bohemians by Rev. Vincent Pisek of the John Huss Memorial church. The committee is also cooperating with the neighborhood house of the American parish, of which Rev. Norman M. Thomas is pastor, in a series of meetings, with music and stereopticon views, for Hungarians and Italians.

Dr. S. D. Gordon, the well-known Bible teacher and author, has just returned with Mrs. Gordon from a several years' tour of the continent of Europe, China, Japan and other countries. Dr. and Mrs. Gordon are visiting friends near New York.

The New York Bible Society has come within $16,000 of its endowment fund of $200,000 which is now being raised. The society last year at Ellis island distributed among the immigrants 109,000 copies of Scripture in more than thirty languages.

News of Summer Assemblies

Dan Crawford at Northfield

Northfield is thrilled in anticipation of the coming of Dan Crawford, author of "Thinking Black," a book which has stirred England and America more than any other missionary book of this decade. He comes with twenty-two years of unbroken service to his credit in the wilds of the Garengauzi country of Africa.

Consider Missionary Education

Rev. J. M. Stifler of Evanston, Ill., will preside at the Geneva conference of the Missionary Education Movement Aug. 1-10. Registrations are coming in rapidly to the office at 19 South La Salle street, Chicago, attracted by the large number of prominent mission workers who will be present. Special attention will be given to the means of missionary education in the Sunday school. A special feature of the conference will be a model exposition with demonstrations of mission activities in several different countries.

Brotherhood Men at Hollister

A day's conference on men's work will be held in connection with the Hollister (Mo.) assembly during the week of Aug. 10. It will be in charge of Dr. J. T. Henderson, associate secretary of the national brotherhood. He will also hold a series of conferences in western Pennsylvania in the early fall.

Andrew and Philip Men Confer

The last day of the summer assembly at Collegeville, Pa., will be devoted to the interests of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, Aug. 7. Among the speakers will be William M. Gordon, president of the international council; Thomas L. Lawton and Rev. R. Howard Taylor. The address in the evening will be by Dr. John Balcom Shaw.

Southern Students Meet

At the Blue Ridge Association grounds at Black Mountain, in the heart of the western North Carolina mountains, from June 17 to 26, there was held the annual southern student Y. M. C. A. conference. It was attended by 266 students, exclusive of leaders, college pastors and others. All institutes, conferences, lectures and mission study classes were remarkably well attended, and great interest was shown, as a result of which the leaders under the able captaincy of Dr. W. D. Weatherford of Nashville, the southern student secretary, feel that much good was done among the boys and young men who during the coming year are to be the leaders in all the religious activities of southern colleges.

Through the series of life work lectures many made decisions as to their vocation and a number volunteered for mission work in the foreign field. The spiritual life of all, it is believed, was quickened under the inspirational leadership of such men as Dr. O. E. Brown of Nashville, President E. M. Poteat of Furman University and Dr. Robert E. Speer of the Foreign Board.

Y. M. C. A. Officers at Silver Bay

Beginning July 30 for the month of August the eastern school for the training of officers of the Y. M. C. A. will be held at Silver Bay, N. Y. In addition to the regular hours there will be special week-end conferences for those who cannot be at the camp all of the time. Dr. W. W. White of New York, Dr. C. A. Barbour of Rochester and M. A. Honline will be among the instructors.

Study Bible at Montreat

The Bible study course at Montreat this summer, July 6 to Aug. 28, will be specially strong. The teachers are to be Doctors J. Gray McAllister, T. R. English, W. M. McPheeters and R. E. Vinson. The story hour for children is a popular new feature. Conferences on Sunday school, young people's work, missions, education and ministerial relief will be held during August.

$2,000 for Two New Books

The American Sunday School Union offers two prizes of $1,000 each for the manuscript of a book. One volume is to be upon "Christian Unity: Jesus Christ's idea of it; how and why it should be realized today," and the other, "Amusements: How can they be made to promote the highest well being of society?" The books must be sent to the Philadelphia office of the union by Oct. 1, 1914, and should be of 40,000 to 70,000 words. There is wide choice as to literary form. These awards are to be made from the income of a trust fund left by John C. Green.

Financial Situation

Pittsburg Bank Failure a Local Trouble—Hot Sun Cuts Down Wheat and Oat Crop—High Rate for Mexican Loan.

Closing of the First-Second National bank of Pittsburg, with $30,000,000 deposits, attracted wide attention last week. However, the statements of bankers and government officials concerning the situation indicate that there need be no apprehension in any other part of the country concerning the stability of general banking conditions. The trouble which focused upon this institution was the result of individual methods of banking rather than any effect of the pending tariff or currency bills or any other outside influence. The bank had been under observation for several months. The activity of the government officials just before it was closed caused one of the largest depositors to withdraw $200,000 and the government refused to permit the bank to open the next morning, knowing that more large withdrawals were contemplated. Other institutions in which W. S. Kuhn, president of the bank, was connected were also closed, and receivers were asked for half a dozen smaller subsidiary concerns in which he was interested. The failure, although a large one, was not a surprise to Pittsburg bankers. The department of justice may take a hand in the situation to investigate possible criminal acts by the officials.

Shrinkage in Probable Grain Crop

The government grain crop report for July 1 was a disappointment to those who have not kept in touch with the effect of the recent weather on crops. There has been a sharp falling off in the prospects for the record yield promised earlier in the season. Hot and dry weather caused an estimated shrinkage of 34,000,000 bushels in the indicated spring wheat crop and 73,000,000 in the oat crop. The condition of both crops is said to be much better now, however, than during the height of the hot wave when the government investigation was made. The same sun that burned the smaller grains caused corn to grow so as to increase largely the indicated yield of that cereal. Corn is in much better condition than a year ago and the crop will be considerably greater from present indications.

Although business fundamentally is sound, there have been a number of untoward circumstances, unrelated in themselves, which have tended to add to the uncertainty with which capital faces the future, and short time notes are favored by many larger investors just now. It is predicted that by next January the financial skies will be cleared and notes maturing then are most eagerly sought.

Mexico Pays Well for Cash

The highest rate for many years offered for government obligations is the 6 per cent ten-year treasury notes of the Mexican government underwritten by an international syndicate recently. They are secured by 38 per cent of the customs income and were sold at 92⅞, thus yielding 6.75 per cent. They were taken in large blocks. It is expected that whatever party may be in power in that much disturbed country the leaders will see the necessity of maintaining their credit with lending nations. This illustrates the principle often explained in this column that an extra high rate of interest means that the investor assumes more than ordinary risk in the matter, and the increased income is payment for that risk rather than fundamentally payment for the use of the money.

There are signs that some of the promoters of stocks which will not stand too close investigation are preparing to take advantage of the present state of public sentiment by bringing out more worthless issues. When stocks and bonds of reputable enterprises are very low, as at the present, many people who might invest if they knew of the opportunity do not touch them. Soon a promoter comes along with promises of large returns and a plausible reason for offering securities at such a low figure and the hard earned or long cherished money is gone. Firms which have been before the public for a long time are the ones to rely upon, and if there is money to invest it is very well worth while to consult conservative bankers rather than plausible speaking strangers.

News Notes from Various Fields

Iowa

A campaign to raise $7,000 to repair and redecorate First church, Davenport, Rev. L. M. Coffman pastor, was recently completed and the work is in progress. The pastor's salary was recently raised.

Rev. Samuel T. Foster, who was installed pastor of Westminster church, Cedar Rapids, July 8, was graduated from Princeton Seminary in 1905 and for three years was pastor at Haverhill, Mass. His last pastorate was at Hopkinton.

Improvements to the amount of about $7,000 are being made to Sidney church. The entire plant will be brought up to the modern requirements for Sunday school and social purposes. Rev. D. H. Cramm is concluding his third year as pastor.

The fiftieth anniversary of Deep River church was celebrated June 26-29. The celebration began June 26 with a sermon by Rev. F. A. Heizer, a former pastor. The following day addresses were given by Reverends J. L. Henning of Montezuma, T. E. Sherman of Williamsburg and M. E. Lumbar of Wilton Junction. The history of the church shows that it has given for all purposes in the fifty years $34,326, of which amount $636 was for home missions and $1,065 for foreign missions. The church has had some years of depression, but now has 114 members.

Minnesota

The new pastor-evangelist of Adams Presbytery is Rev. J. C. Strand, formerly of Morgan. He now resides in East Grand Forks.

Willmar adopted the budget plan April 1 and the finance committee reports the budget of $3,400 nearly raised. This does away with all solicitations and extra collections.

Litchfield church under Rev. U. G. Lacey has during the last two or three years taken the leading place in presbytery in the amount of benevolences. The salary of the pastor, who has been there five years, was recently increased.

The installation of Rev. William Anderson over Western, Lawrence and Wendell churches took place June 5 at a united service in the Lawrence church. S. F.- Sharpless, D. D., A. J. Herries, D. D., and Rev. John H. Mark took part.

Dr. and Mrs. Carl J. Shellman and family have started on their return trip to Siam, where the doctor is a medical missionary. Before starting Central church, Austin, of which Rev. Robert Brown is pastor, presented Dr. and Mrs. Shellman with an ice-making machine, engine and all necessary equipment.

New York

Rev. Edgar E. Davidson of Newtonville, Mass., conducted services in Dewey Avenue church, Rochester, and a large number joined the church as a result.

During July and August First church, Olean, will unite with the M. E. congregation in a 6 o'clock service in the park. The meetings are under the auspices of the men's organizations.

Geneseo church has entered the fifth year of the pastorate of Rev. Theodore Melville Carlisle. The church's missionary to Korea, Rev. Edward McFarland, recently paid a visit to the congregation and did great good.

Ohio

Rev. W. J. Dempster of Urbana was recently elected pastoral adviser to a newly formed county Christian Endeavor union.

The Presbyterian and U. P. churches of Bloomfield, near Concord, have united under the U. P. denomination. They formerly were one, but separated some years ago.

Dr. John Clark Hill, formerly pastor of First church, Springfield, has been employed during the past year in supplying some of the larger churches in Detroit, Cincinnati and elsewhere. During August he is to supply in Dayton and Glendale.

First church at Middletown is recovering from the effects of the flood, although the damage amounted to nearly $5,000.

The dedication of the new Central church, Akron, took place June 29. A number of ministers from various cities took part in the program. The building cost $22,000.

Edward L. Wehrenberg, pastor of Long's Run church, Calcutta, has resigned to accept the chair of Greek and Latin of Hastings College, Hastings, Neb.. Mr. Wehrenberg will spend two months at Wooster.

Illinois

The Christian Endeavor society of Twelfth Street church, Alton, recently contributed to the flood sufferers in Ohio.

Officers of Bushnell church have authorized the expenditure of $1,000 on improvements to the church and manse to be undertaken at once.

Lexington church recently lost a member of national repute through the death of Miss Permelia Mahon. Miss Mahon was a national organizer and lecturer of the W. C. T. U. and was regarded as its expert parliamentarian.

One of the Sunday school classes of Petersburg church has raised $500 as an initial fund to apply on larger and more modern Sunday school equipment. The pastor, Rev. H. M. Hildebrandt, has been conducting a teacher training class. The elders conduct the prayer meetings.

Dr. Scott F. Hershey has taken charge of the work of First church, Springfield, for the summer months in order to prepare the church for the coming of the new pastor, Dr. Donald C. MacLeod of Washington, D. C. Dr. Hershey has held meetings with various portions of the congregation and a series of cottage prayer meetings has been planned.

June 29 marked the close of Dr. W. H. Penhallegon's pastorate of twenty-four years over First church, Decatur. Among the earlier achievements of this pastorate was the building of the impressive stone church, which is one of the most imposing structures in Illinois Synod. The newly elected pastor, Rev. C. E. Jenney, is on the field. Dr. Penhallegon has assumed his new duties as syndic treasurer of Millikin University.

Wisconsin

The saloons of Madison and Dane county were closed on Sunday.

Miss Anna Campbell, kindergarten teacher in Madison, will leave soon for Persia, where she will be a missionary.

Rev. L. W. Ewing of Washington Park church, Milwaukee, has gathered a large congregation in the old building and there is to be erected a fine modern church with social and Sunday school rooms at 39th and Elm streets.

The little church in Crivitz is happy in its new edifice, which has been completed at a cost of $1,550 and dedicated June 9 free of debt. Rev. C. A. Adams, superintendent of home missions, assisted by Rev. Donald L. West of Wausaukee, conducted most helpful services, which were continued all day.

Rev. Joseph Brown of Marshfield, the veteran Sunday school missionary, on June 30 completed his twenty-fifth year of work in Wisconsin. During this time he has covered a large portion of the state, organized over 900 Sabbath schools and built over eighty mission chapels in needy and growing districts.

An echo of "The World in Chicago" was given in Beloit recently by the Christian Endeavor society of First church, which presented a program "The World in Beloit." Exhibits of curios from various foreign countries, together with an interesting patriotic and missionary program, entertained the audience.

The French churches at Robinsonville and St. Saveur are grouped with the English church at Wequiock under the charge of Rev. Ernest Tremblay. At St. Saveur the little band has begun a new edifice, which is much needed. They are making sacrifices to secure their church and have entered into an agreement that each one will do all he possibly can and the taxpayers will put into the building fund an amount equal to their taxes. If more is needed they will duplicate the amount until enough is secured to complete the building.

Pennsylvania

Evangelist John S. Hamilton of Cleveland, Ohio, just closed a meeting at Monessen, with more than 750 professed conversions and reclamations.

Through the generosity of an elder and his wife the congregation at Freeland, Lehigh Presbytery, has been presented with silver individual communion trays.

Rev. J. K. Argo, pastor of Glen Campbell and Arcadia churches, was recently elected president of the Cherry Tree Sunday school district. The church at Arcadia has doubled in membership since January.

Erie Presbytery has made arrangements for a second series of illustrated lectures to be given this fall by Rev. D. E. Finks, lecturer for the Home Board. Butler Presbytery has also arranged an extensive itinerary following the lectures in Erie Presbytery.

The newspaper report to the effect that Rev. A. F. Waldo of Chambersburg has arranged to "serve ice cream soda after prayer meeting" during the hot season is incorrect. The newspaper correspondent based his "story" on the simple fact that some of the attendants at a recent meeting visited a neighboring soda fountain on their way home.

New Jersey

Four special trains were needed to take the Sunday school of First church, Newark, on its recent picnic to Ocean Grove.

At the close of seventeen years of service as chorister of the Sunday school of First church, Elizabeth, Eugene O. Winans was given an electric table lamp. Presentation was made at a meeting addressed by Rev. Fred W. Lewis, pastor of Forest Hill church, Newark, on the proper building facilities for a Sunday school. First church is looking forward to the erection of a chapel to take the place of the present one.

Indiana

Rev. W. J. Darby delivered the address at the laying of the corner stone of the new Washington Avenue church, Evansville, June 29. Various other local pastors assisted in the ceremony.

The church at Lawrenceburg has been repaired at expense of several hundred dollars following the damage by the spring flood. Rev. A. F. Davis, pastor, and his wife were given a reception recently previous to his departure for new work at Mitchell.

Maryland

The Presbytery of Baltimore met with Sparrow's Point church June 15, and besides conducting routine business engaged in a very profitable conference on evangelism. The committee has inaugurated a movement among the laymen along this line which promises to be of great value during the coming year.

Missouri

W. R. Painter, lieutenant governor of the state, is superintendent of the Sunday school at Carrollton, and has recently been made chairman of the program committee of the brotherhood. A number of other prominent business men of the city take active part in this church, of which Rev. O. B. Lee is pastor.

California

Five thousand sermons have been preached by Dr. J. W. Dinsmore, who celebrated his fifty years in the ministry with a reception under the auspices of presbytery at San Jose June 27. Dr. Dinsmore held several pastorates in Wisconsin and was pastor at Bloomington, Ill., before going to California. Rev. H. H. McQuilkin, Rev. W. W. Kirkpatrick and Rev. George I. Long and others had part in the program.

Professor William Martin of the chair of apologetics and missions in San Francisco Seminary presented his resignation at a meeting of the board held late in June. It was accepted to take effect July 1 and a committee was appointed to express to Professor Martin its appreciation of the faithful work he has done during the past three years. He intends to return at once to the pastorate in which he has rendered important service in the past. President Landon was appointed chairman of the committee to nominate a successor.

Colorado

Presbyterians led by nearly 100 in the enrollment at the recent Christian Endeavor convention at Longmont over other denominational delegations. The junior society at Canon City received the banner for increase in membership.

Michigan

William Clark Burns, D. D., pastor of First church, Monroe, is spending the summer abroad. A new heating plant will be installed in this church during the summer which, with other improvements, will cost about $2,500.

Oregon

Rev. Arthur Heathcote, who is serving seven different points in Harney county, has obtained a lot from the town site company at Juntura and in a tent erected there has organized a Sunday school.

Kansas

The men's evangelistic team of Grace church, Wichita, last year held forty-four meetings. Rev. Charles W. Blake, pastor, recently resigned on account of ill health.

Nebraska

A committee of Fairbury congregation is at work devising ways and means for a new house of worship. Rev. S. J. Megaw is pastor.

Presbyterians at Portland Conference

The Presbyterian Church was well represented at the world's Christian citizenship conference at Portland. President Henry Collin Minton, D. D., has the right to be mentioned first because of his official position. He filled well the arduous position, just as he did well the work of moderator of General Assembly.

Probably the most noted speaker of the entire conference was Robert F. Coyle, D. D., of Central church, Denver. Fortunately Dr. Coyle was given a place at the first public meeting. His address, "I Am for Men," took strong hold of the large audience and gave him his position immediately. If he had spoken every day he would have filled the stadium. His second address, on "The Menace of Mormonism," was a fearless arraignment of that cult, and it made such an impression that the next day there appeared a two-column open letter to Dr. Coyle and the conference denying his statements, reflecting on the character of Mr. Cannon, who wrote up his old church so forcefully, and challenging Dr. Coyle to a debate. The writer never lived in Utah, but he has seen many who have lived there.

Judge Wolverton of the United States court and H. R. Albee, both of whom addressed the conference, are Presbyterian laymen. Dr. Wicher of San Anselmo Seminary, Dr. William Parsons of Eugene, Ore.; Dr. Walter Laidlaw of New York, Dr. Macdonald of Toronto, Dr. Mark A. Matthews of Seattle, Dr. Ng Poon Chew of San Francisco and Dr. Holderby of Philadelphia all had prominent places in the conference. Dr. Ng was one of the most interesting of all the men. Witty, clear, prompt, rapid, he was received with the most hearty applause.

School and College

Articles of incorporation for Harper University, a Presbyterian institution at Billings, Mont., have been filed. Dr. John M. Hervey is one of the incorporators. It is planned to obtain ten acres near the city as a site. It is said the funds for buildings have been tentatively promised.

This summer, as in every year, improvements and redecorations at Mary Baldwin Seminary, Staunton, Va., maintain the institution as one of the most modern and attractive schools of its class in the country. The chapel, now modernized, was formerly the church in which the father of President Wilson preached.

Three of the eight men of the graduating class of Huron College will enter theological seminaries.

Rev. N. W. Thornton has recently been elected principal and field secretary for Geneseo (Ill.) Collegiate Institute. Preparations are being made to complete the endowment of the school.

Staunton Military Academy will have its large and handsome new mess hall ready for use when the school reopens. Besides providing a thoroughly modern dining hall, commissary and cooking quarters, the upper story will be occupied by one of the finest laboratories possessed by any secondary school in the country.

Ministerial Obituary

Rev. Alexander Litherland

After failing to return home as expected, Rev. Alexander Litherland of Stites, Idaho, was found on the road dead by a searching party. He was 51 years old and had been pastor at Stites for three years.

Rev. David Street

The funeral of Rev. David Street was held at his late home in Utica, N. Y., July 1. All the members of the family were present with the exception of one son, Rev. Alfred Street, Hainan, China. Dr. Hobbs of Westminster church, assisted by Dr. Biglow, conducted the services.

Mr. Street was born in Salem, Ohio, Feb. 23, 1838. He attended Haverford College in Pennsylvania. Sept. 29, 1859, he was united in marriage to Eunice Fawcett, who, with six sons and three daughters, survives him. After several years spent in business he became connected with the Y. M. C. A. in Cleveland, Ohio, where he was influenced to study for the ministry. For thirty years he was engaged in home mission work in Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Ohio and Indiana. Five years ago he retired and for three years had made his home in Utica, where he often supplied pulpits. The last Sabbath of his life he delivered three sermons.

Clergy and Laity

Dr. A. R. Taylor, retiring president of James Millikin University, who has been elected president emeritus, will probably make Coffeyville, Kan., his home.

Arthur P. Vaughn, D. D., former editor and publisher of The Pacific Presbyterian, San Francisco, severed his connection early in June with the company which now publishes that paper and other denominational journals. Dr. Vaughn continues to reside in California, and has occasionally supplied pulpits in San Francisco and vicinity during the vacation season.

THORNE—Rev. Chester C. Thorne, after a long illness, died June 9 at his home in Windham, N. Y. He was born near Rensselaerville, Albany county, N. Y. With high honor he graduated from Union College, Schenectady, N.Y., during the last days of Dr. Eliphalet Mott's connection with that institution. He always greatly revered Dr. Mott. Intending to make civil engineering his profession, he studied for it, but in an interval of teaching, in which he was highly successful, he was converted and at once his thoughts turned to the ministry. Graduating from Auburn Theological Seminary about 1865, he became for forty-two years, without the loss of a single year, an efficient and useful minister of the Presbyterian church. Thirteen years with the church in Shortsville, N. Y., four years in the state of Florida, where he went for the health of his only child, and where he cared for one church and organized two others, and nearly seventeen years with the church in Windham, N. Y., were his last pastorates. He was a close thinker, elegant in speech and diction, with a loving, unswerving fidelity to the truths of the gospel. With deep spiritual insight of its truths, and, too, with a deep sense of the sacredness of his office, his ministrations were successful and his personality respected and beloved. A sorrowful throng gathered June 12 for funeral service in the church where only a few years before he had so long ministered. Afterward he was taken to Skaneateles, N. Y., the home and burial place of the Thorne family. Professor Hoyt of Auburn seminary was with the relatives and friends who gathered for the burial, speaking briefly of the loyalty of the deceased to Auburn seminary.

BARTLE—Rev. William Toy Bartle, in his 92nd year, June 19, Claremont, Cal. Buried June 24, Cromwell, Ia.

"To Know, to Be, to Do"

You expect the school your daughter attends to develop her into a woman of character and personality. Beechwood School does this and more. It discovers each student's ambitions and abilities along practical lines, and fits her for any remunerative vocation which she may need or desire to pursue later in life. And does each thoroughly. Early training for possible emergencies is most wise and prudent. No daughter should be left unprepared.

Around the Shop

Not every educational institution has awakened to the fact that provision for efficient business management by a specially qualified executive is about the best investment that can be made. Mary Baldwin Institute, the thriving school for young women at Staunton, Va., made the discovery long ago, and its splendidly managed plant is a perennial evidence of the ability of its business manager, W. W. King.

The Around-the-Shop Man's exclusive personal representative took a few hours' special course in school management with Mr. King recently which he would like to share with others if it were possible. Just one point, however, must be the limit of the Around-the-Shop Man's participation.

"You will observe," said Mr. King, "that every bed in our school is equipped with an Ostermoor mattress. I selected that mattress for two reasons.

"First, it is a high-class mattress.

"Second, it is advertised throughout the country. People know about it.

"If I tell them we have Ostermoor mattresses that is sufficient. We don't need to specify.

"I follow the same plan in my other purchases—even in my supplies for the kitchen.

"The name gives assurance to me and to our students and their parents when we use nationally known articles." And, of course, the only nationally known articles are those which are advertised.

Mary Baldwin Institute is not a commercial institution, but good business management is certainly shown there to be worth while. Men and women who study efficiency realize that it pays to buy advertised articles—and to advertise.

Buy advertised goods and be sure; no concern can profit permanently by advertising unless it lives up to its promises.

The Life of the Soft Step

"I shall go softly all my years because of the bitterness of my soul."

So spoke Hezekiah the king when the tide of health came flowing back into his veins after that fierce illness of his from which there had seemed to be no possible recovery.

A bold, strong man was Hezekiah—a strenuous man who had dealt with the tasks of his kingship as a smith smites iron, quick and hard—a man of action, bent on having done the thing he saw to do and with no patience at delays. If obstacles and hardships loomed up before him, he drove at them with main force and headlong determination.

Thus had be traversed the youthful years of his reign. Life was a joyous map of obvious duties to him. His days were a calendar of successes. All was plain and open and unmysterious.

But then came the earthquaking assault of Sennacherib upon his kingdom and capital. After that the terrible disease. And he was helpless before both. Only by the hand of God interposed had he escaped from either calamity.

Yet now he was getting well. And his foes had gone—the heartless Assyrian and the awful legions of Nineveh dead and very sure not to trouble him more. God had shown him most signal favor. Surely Hezekiah may take up living again with all his old boldness, his old-time swing, confidence and aggressiveness. Strong once more and back to the strenuous life!

No, Hezekiah is not returning to the strenuous life. No longer is he the fiery Hezekiah he was before—no longer the youth so certain of himself, so sure that life is all simple and understandable, to be disposed of with one impetuous stroke of action after another.

The king had been walking ways his earlier years had not known—ways of fear and humiliation and disappointment and suffering. These have been the "bitterness" of his soul. And the descent into such experiences—still more, the wonderful ascent out of them—have laid on his life a solemn awe that can never be shaken off.

He will be well again and able to work and ready to serve his Lord. But the world will never again seem to him simple and easy for a strong man's hands to handle. He will never again bear himself jauntily as a man fit for any task, armed to leap recklessly to any fight. A strange self-distrust mantles his heart.

Fifteen years of his reign remain to him, and Hezekiah will try to do his duty. But the weight and problem of duty—the measure of life's obligations—are vastly greater than he had dreamed; the puzzle of life is stranger than he had imagined. No man, he knows now, dares venture to meet life's tasks without God—God in prosperity as needful as God in adversity.

And this is what has driven out his old self-confidence before the increeping reverence that possesses his soul. To dash wildly and noisily through life, vaunting one's own strength and pursuing one's own will, is as impious as to stride with haughty clank of sword and spurs through the quiet temple courts. 'God is in his holy temple—and in life.

Wherefore Hezekiah knows that for all the years remaining to him he must walk softly—awesomely—head bent, voice hushed, ears hearkening to divine whispers. Life is too mysterious and too solemn to be roistered with or boasted over.

And this is what Hezekiah learned when for his peace, as he says, he had "great bitterness."

And it is for sake of bringing them this same experience of peace—this lesson in walking softly amid the awe and puzzle of the years—that the heavenly Father to this day permits his children to suffer great bitterness in their souls.

Youth, by the common consent of humanity, is not expected to take life seriously. Its boisterousness and self-assertion are forgiven; its daring and rash courage are admired. For a season at least it seems well that the young man shall not too keenly understand how enormous a task he has undertaken by beginning to live.

But all life cannot be frivolous if it is to be wholesome and fine, nor recklessly romantic and cavalier if it is to do service in the world's tasks.

There are indeed those who in age as in youth still refuse all serious meanings in living, but their hilarities and prides, though seeming comedy in the morning of their careers, turn to unmistakable tragedy long before the sunset.

Those alone vindicate their manhood and justify their lives who have learned ere the noon that there is something awful in the mere necessity of spending a lifetime in a world whose doubts and perplexities no human wisdom has ever yet explicated. Sobriety of life has no alternative but cheap and empty folly.

To sense sacredness in the commonplaces of human experience, to realize the dread burden of being a man and answering for the obligations of that estate, to know the thousand perilous chances of going wrong and the one sublime possibility of going right—these are the revealing motions of the soul that check the bold stride of self-confidence and warn the reverent foot to go softly.

But how shall the youth learn all this? While everything around him prosperously urges forward his gay and leaping step; while success attends him and the favor of men remains to feed his vanity; while health renews and reaffirms the power to do, there is little chance for the quieter message of God to steal into his heart.

But God knows how much the young man needs the other lesson, and so in some form or another, sooner or later, the Father brings him into "bitterness." It is pain or loss or opposition or the stress of labor heavier than even youth can bear with head erect, and at length it brings the man to the ground in heartache and dismay.

Then the mighty help of God envelops him. Then a nobler strength than his own revives him. Then the stiffening of a courage which is not his sets him erect again. But not for vaunting and strutting as before—but for humble wonder that the eternal Helper is so near, so dependable and so sufficient.

Hard work, determined fighting, steadfast endurance, after that, but no more swashbuckling. Who would swagger in a world where he had felt—even seen—God hasten to his help in the extremity of his weakness and failure?

No; in that world where God walks so near and ready at hand one must always carry with him the deference due to a kinglier Presence than any king of earth.

Thus are we taught to "go softly all our years."

The World

Relations with Mexico Seem Near Crisis

It is highly probable that this week will see the announcement of a more or less definite policy by the United States with regard to Mexico. The American ambassador, Henry Lane Wilson, has been called to Washington for conference and will arrive the middle of this week. Meantime the cabinet is standing back of the President in his determination not to recognize the government of Mexico as now constituted until peace has been established. Led by England, practically all the great nations of the world have recognized the Huerta administration, and statements have been made that the failure of this government to take some decided stand in regard to the neighboring republic on the south has contributed to the disorders which have characterized that country recently.

Intimations have been received from several powers that the United States should soon take some action in regard to Mexico or permit other nations to do so. It has been President Wilson's policy that this nation should insist upon governments in Latin America being set up by orderly processes and not through arbitrary and irregular force. Huerta, who took the reigns of power from the murdered Madero, has been able to maintain his grip upon the central states, but his forces have been beaten again and again in the north. The United States has on its southern border a large force of troops ready for any needed action, and the secretary of war himself is now in that vicinity on a tour of inspection. There are warships in the gulf, and if it becomes necessary to make a display of power to quell the disturbances, which recently seem to have increased, this nation will be in a condition to do so. The administration is recognized as having on its hands a delicate diplomatic problem, and it seems agreed that the American policy of laissez faire may have to be abandoned, although it is the opinion of conservative thinkers that intervention should come only when all other measures have been exhausted and the necessity for such radical action has been made clear. Reports of violence against American citizens and representatives and anti-American demonstrations have been current, although it has been reported that a number of these demonstrations have been especially manufactured as a basis for international pressure upon the United States.

Important Move in Latin America Policy

A proposed treaty with Nicaragua which practically amounts to an American protectorate over that republic has been laid by Secretary Bryan before the senate. The treaty, which was negotiated during the closing days of the Taft administration, provides that this country shall give the Central American republic $3,000,000 for the exclusive right to construct an interoceanic canal across that country. This will close the route to European powers and give the United States a naval base on the Pacific coast. An amendment to the former treaty, now proposed, binds Nicaragua never to enter into any compact with any foreign power which will tend to impair the independence of the republic or permit any foreign power to obtain a military or naval base there. Under another provision Nicaragua also permits the United States to intervene to preserve her independence.

Bulgaria Denies Atrocities; Seems to Be Yielding

There are no newspaper correspondents with the armies now fighting in the Balkans, and the news sent out from the various capitals is so censored that it is difficult for the average newspaper reader to get a clear idea of the various steps which are beng taken in changing the map of Europe. According to a statement issued from Salonica by the king of Greece the atrocities which have been perpetrated by the Bulgarian army have been such as human history has never before reported. He says that there is not a village which has been occupied by the Bulgarians which has not had its men, women and children slaughtered. At Dorian, it is alleged, 30,000 Mussulmans were slaughtered and their goods plundered. It was here also that the Greek bishop and thirty notables were slaughtered. At Seres the king says that the parliamentary committee which visited the place found the bodies of 100 women who had been burned alive. It is also claimed that there is evidence to show that slaughter in this city was deliberately planned.

As a reply to these charges of Greece, Ferdinand of Bulgaria, through his secretary, cabled the Associated Press at New York that all rumors of Bulgarian atrocities were infamous Greek calumnies. Neither Servia nor Greece has paid any attention to Russia's proposal that they cease hostilities.

At the beginning of the week there were fairly authenticated reports that Bulgaria, realizing her defeat, would cede to Roumania the territory demanded by that country, the inference being that Greece and Servia would be permitted to retain the districts they now hold. The prospect for early peace is not made more hopeful by Turkey's appearance with an assertion of her claim to the line of the Maritza river and her reoccupation of Adrianople.

Senate Makes Schedule Still Lower

A report of the majority of the finance committee of the senate on the pending tariff bill recognizes rates which are 4.22 per cent lower than those in the bill that passed the house and 27.64 per cent under the Payne-Aldrich schedules. It is said this is the first time on record that a tariff bill has presented a lower average of rates after emerging from the senate finance committee than when it passed the house. Republican senators have practically agreed to put no serious stumblingblock in the way of the passage of the bill, although they will have the opportunity of placing on record their views of the various schedules. Senator Root has suggested that in order to remedy a possible unconstitutional feature the bill should be amended so that the income tax shall be computed from the date on which the bill becomes a law rather than from the first day of March, 1913, as the bill now stands. There has been a large increase in the imports to be admitted free of duty, although it is estimated that the measure will return a revenue for the fiscal year of $996,810,000. The senate committee has approved the imposition of a tax of 1.1 per cent per pound for all cotton sold to cotton exchanges for future delivery.

England's New Poet Laureate, Robert Bridges

Robert Bridges has been appointed by Premier Asquith to the office of poet laureate to succeed the late Alfred Austin. The new laureate is little known to the American public and is obscure even among the literary men of Great Britain, but his standing is said to be high in the circle of friends who know and love him. He began his active career as a physician and from a busy professional career in London he passed nearly thirty years ago to the quiet seclusion of Oxford, where he has since lived, devoting himself to poetry and music. His collected works issued six years ago are contained in eight volumes, and more recently a one-volume edition has been brought out, together with five books of shorter poems. The latter show the undoubted lyrical talent of the poet in classical and nature themes. Critics describe his verse as delightful and full of charm, but without dramatic emphasis. Mr. Bridges was born in 1844.

Secretary of State and His Income

William Jennings Bryan has furnished a large amount of newspaper copy during the dull days of summer as a result of his voluntary statement that he is forced to appear upon the lecture platform for pay in order to supplement his income of $12,000 a year as an officer of the government. Mr. Bryan said that in accepting his present office he was forced to give up the opportunity he has enjoyed during the last few years of adding to his accumulations, and while he was perfectly willing to forego the acquisition of additional wealth, he did not feel himself called upon to use up his savings in order to serve the public as secretary of state. Senator Bristow of Kansas immediately introduced a resolution asking the President to inform the senate what would be a proper salary to enable the secretary of state to live with comfort and to permit him to give all his time to the discharge of public duties. This resolution was tabled later and its author made uncomfortable by Senator Ashurst of Arizona, who read a letter by Senator Bristow written several years ago asking a place at $7,500 a year as member of the canal commission, suggesting that he could thus spend half his time at home.

It is pointed out by some newspaper correspondents that it is probable that a portion of Mr. Bryan's financial difficulties arise from his reultance in asking the government to pay expenses which he believes to be personal. It is said that for his recent trip to California Mr. Bryan turned in a bill of $181 for expenditures outside of railway fares, though as a matter of fact the trip cost him more than twice that amount. It is also understood that Mr. Bryan has not asked the government to reimburse him for the expense of official dinners. His friends assert that Mr. Bryan has not been absent from his office as long as previous secretaries have been, and declare that his absence on lecture tours is of public benefit because he is able to keep in close touch with the people.

New Board to Handle Railroad Disputes

William L. Chambers of the District of Columbia and Judge Martin Knapp of the United States commerce court have been named as members of the national board of mediation and conciliation established in record time when the Newlands bill was rushed through Congress and signed by President Wilson in a day. This act was designed specifically to alleviate the deadlock between the conductors and trainmen and the managers of forty-two lines east of Chicago. The new board is, however, a permanent institution to aid in the adjustment of disputes between railroads and their employees, and Commissioner Chambers and his assistant, G. W. W. Hanger, will devote all of their time to their new duties. Mr. Chambers is experienced as a labor arbiter and Mr. Hanger has been acting head of the bureau of labor statistics.

Soon after the enactment of this law the roads announced that they had eight matters regarding the relation of the lines to the employees which they would ask to have arbitrated by the new board. This move was met by the officers of the conductors and trainmen with the assertion that they would not have the grievances of the men and the requests of the roads arbitrated at the same time. They intimated that the men would strike unless their grievances alone were considered. The roads later agreed to let the board decide what should first be the subject of discussion. Further complication has arisen over the refusal of the Erie road to be bound by any action which the managers of the various roads might take. The Erie has declared that it cannot afford to raise wages and that there is nothing to arbitrate.

Killing of Rand Rioters Arouses Comment

The recent killing by government troops of strikers on the Rand in South Africa has brought about criticism by members of both parties in the British house of commons. It is felt that troops should not be used to shoot down strikers. The mine workers have complained of the constant attempt to cut wages, the refusal to pay a minimum wage, in addition to the insecurity of employment and the high mortality in the mines. It is announced in Johannesburg that an effort will be made to demand the recall of Viscount Gladstone, governor general of the union of South Africa, and the recall of imperial troops from South Africa "because they are used only to coerce the working classes," according to a labor member of the provincial council at Pretoria.

Mulhall Inquiry Grows in Scope

Thus far the investigations by the two congressional committees into the charges made by Martin M. Mulhall, the self-confessed lobbyist for the National Association of Manufacturers, have brought before the public a mass of information, some of which has been immediately refuted by public men charged by the lobbyist with having received help from the manufacturers. Hundreds of letters have been identified by Colonel Mulhall in the hearings, and the names of men prominent in political life have been involved in the charges made, although the information brought to light has been more or less fragmentary. The documents indicate that Mulhall worked in harmony with the late Vice-President Sherman, Speaker Cannon and James E. Watson of Indiana. The association of manufacturers is alleged to have had an almost inexhaustible fund in carrying out a program of controlling the legislation of Congress and influencing labor leaders.

Colonel Mulhall declared that the manufacturers aided materially in securing the Republican presidential nomination for Taft and that Arthur I. Vorys, prenomination campaign manager for Mr. Taft, promised the manufacturers the right to name a member of Mr. Taft's cabinet and also a member of the Republican campaign committee. It was also testified that the association combined with reactionary influences in the Republican party during the closing days of Roosevelt's administration to defeat the President's legislative program.

Opium Conference at The Hague Inconclusive

The international conference for the suppression of the opium evil which held an adjourned session the first week of this month at The Hague was far from conclusive in its results. The question of what shall be done with 20,000 chests of the "black poison" which have been accumulated by British speculators in China treaty ports is still open. The Chinese can neither buy it nor smoke it without violating their own laws, and it has been suggested by British papers that England use its money from the Boxer indemnity to purchase and destroy this accumulated supply. Twenty-five nations participated by delegates in this recent conference. All of these nations, in addition to nine others not represented, have signed the treaty prohibiting opium traffic. Great Britain and Germany insist on waiting until at least several of the twelve governments that have so far failed to sign the treaty have done so before they ratify it. It was agreed at The Hague that the diplomatic representatives of the signatory powers in the capitals of the nonsignatory powers should unitedly urged the latter to sign before the end of this year. Meanwhile the traffic will continue.

Sunday School Hosts to Meet in Tokyo

The 1916 convention of the World's Sunday School Association will be held in Tokyo in response to invitations presented at the recent conference at Zurich. It is reported that $110,000 was raised during one forenoon at Zurich toward the $175,000 needed to enlarge the work during the next three years. H. J. Heinz of Pittsburg, head of a party of Sunday school experts who toured the East previous to the convention, reported on Sunday school progress in Hawaii, Japan, China, Korea and the Philippines. There were 2,500 registered delegates in attendance representing over fifty countries. Pennsylvania, with 175 delegates, led all the other states of the country in the number of delegates. One of the striking features of the convention was a mass meeting on Sunday afternoon to consider the general topic of temperance and good citizenship.

—Prominent ministers and religious workers from all over the world attended the triennial session of the International Congress of Free Christianity and Religious Progress which opened at Paris, France, July 16 for a week. Previous sessions of this organization have been held in London, Amsterdam, Geneva, Boston and Berlin. Speakers of distinction were present from many foreign countries, including Dr. David Starr Jordan, Sir Henry James, Pastor Charles Wagner, Rudolf Eucken, Henri Bergson and Rabbi Stephen S. Wise

The Ten Thousand and One at Los Angeles

BY ROBERT B. McCAIN

AMONG the things that bulk big in a day when only big things seem worthy of mention "Millionaire Endeavor" does not need to feel ashamed. The 10,001 delegates who attended the twenty-sixth international convention at Los Angeles represented a movement that has drawn into its membership in the last thirty-three years 15,000,000 young men and women, and, if we reckon the number of members in societies that have substantially the Christian Endeavor principles, has now an active membership of 5,000,000 souls.

The biggest thing exhibited in Christian Endeavor today is not, and cannot be, recorded in statistical tables; it is its world vision of service for Christ and the church. The great auditorium, seating over 10,000, was crowded to its utmost when Leonard Merrill, chairman of the committee of 1913, rose to make the address of welcome and present to Dr. Clark a gavel. The supporting poles of the great tent were decorated with spreading palm branches and festoons of flags of the nations. A great sounding board behind the chorus of a thousand voices sent the tones of both singers and speakers to the farthest corners of the auditorium. It was a palm garden with perfect acoustic properties. But brightest and best of all was the bubbling enthusiasm of the delegates. Their faces were brighter than the flags, their voices rang in song and yell and joyous laughter. There was a maximum of animation, with a minimum of confusion.

This convention was the culmination of almost ten years of effort on the part of Los Angeles Endeavorers to secure an international meeting for southern California. In presenting the gavel to Dr. Clark Mr. Merrill said that the gavel was made of wood from one of the original olive trees planted by the Franciscan fathers when they established their first mission in San Diego. The handle was of a branch of the original Washington navel orange tree, which since 1845 has given to southern California one of her principal industries. Dr. Clark, in accepting the gavel, declared that it, more than any he had ever received, symbolized the growth and development of Christian Endeavor. For as these fruit trees—the olive and the orange—had multiplied themselves a million times, so Christian Endeavor from small beginnings has grown in numbers and in strength till its beneficent influence now encircles the globe.

The watchword given by Dr. Clark in his address outlining a great forward movement in Christian Endeavor is "increase and efficiency." The increase campaign inaugurated four years ago resulted in great forward strides in membership and in the number of the societies. The efficiency campaign of the past two years, calling attention to the value of intensive effort in the work of the society, has produced such gratifying results that it is to be made a permanent feature of the Christian Endeavor movement. Twelve hundred members have been enrolled as experts. One hundred of these were present at the convention, and their recognition at the closing service was an inspiring sight. Ten societies have attained the maximum percentage of 100. The three societies which first attained this grade are all Presbyterian—First Cumberland, Knoxvill, Tennessee; First church, Canon City, Colorado, and Cross Creek, Ohio.

Spirit of the Crusaders Inspires Young People

The spirit of the crusaders stirred the breasts of the delegates as they set this standard of larger members and greater effectiveness in service; and as they lifted up their eyes on the great world-field in which their labors are to be expended they saw the cross triumphant in civic righteousness, world peace, Christian citizenship, temperance and the conquest of the heathen lands for Christ and the church.

No man speaks with greater conviction of the power of Christian love as a universal solvent of human difficulty than James A. Macdonald. Three great audiences listened to his impassioned pleas for a practical application of the principles of the gospel to the problems of human life, and all demonstrated a most hearty approval of the sentiment.

The influence of the Christian Endeavor movement in behalf of world peace was graphically stated by Rev. R. P. Anderson. In conventions and in all the publications of the United Society this idea is emphasized; but by far the most powerful influence has been exerted in behalf of the peace propaganda by the repetition of the words of the society pledge in the millions of meetings throughout the world. More than a thousand petitions were signed by as many societies and forwarded last year to members of congress urging them to take a definite stand for world peace. The republic of China was born in a Christian Endeavor home, when Dr. Little acted as an intermediary between Wu Ting Fang and Sun Yat Sen. The peaceful passage of that crisis in the affairs of the young republic can be counted nothing less than a triumph of Christian principles. Mr. Anderson asserted, with the evident hearty approval of all who heard his words, that Dr. Clark is a great peace society in himself, than whom no man living is more deserving the Nobel peace prize.

Will Work for Saloonless Nation

In harmony with the slogan of the allied temperance organizations of the country, the convention declared for a saloonless nation in 1920. The officers and field secretaries of the United Society, of which Rev. Daniel A. Poling is national superintendent of temperance and Christian citizenship, are a committee to cooperate with the Anti-Saloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Young Men's Christian Association and the national Prohibition party to secure an amendment to the federal constitution which will prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the United States.

The cosmopolitan character of the movement was shown most strikingly in the nationalities represented in the convention. Besides delegates from forty-seven states and territories in the United States, and from seven provinces in Canada, there were representatives from Mexico, Cuba, Porto Rico, Jamaica, Great Britain,

Keeping the Church Afloat

A CHURCH in one of the cities of the Central West found that its results were not satisfactory and appointed a committee to survey the whole situation and bring in a report. That committee went carefully into all the matters affecting the church. In its report there occurred a striking analysis of the relation of the numerous societies to the church of which they were a part. The committee reported that the societies of the church were "like water-tight compartments, which keep it afloat, but urge it on to no port." That is a striking way of putting a common fact.

The ship needs water-tight compartments; and if the church is to be compared to a ship, then it needs such compartments. There are doubtless societies which serve that purpose properly. But no ship which simply floats is carrying any of the heavy commerce of the world. Some of us have had occasion to go out on the sea for pleasure outing spending the day drifting about, going nowhere in particular and simply having a delicious day of loafing. That is perfectly proper, but it would never get anyone across the sea, nor accomplish the task of a ship. Yet this is all that many societies actually do in a church. They run a narrow round, they do a petty piece of work, but they have no conception of the heavy responsibility and task of the church of Christ, and they have no purpose nor method of doing the real work of the church. They keep it afloat, but they urge it on to no port.

It is no more true of men's clubs than of other societies, but it is often enough true of them. They are delightful social organizations. They meet and talk and eat and hear addresses. At the end of the year the question persistently arises, What has it all come to? Sometimes it is worth while for men to come together on a purely social basis, for the sake of acquaintance, and for the sake of realizing their fellowship. That may be the original purpose of a men's club, but such a purpose is fatal to the enduring life and efficiency of a club. Most men are too busy to come together for the sake of meeting good fellows, and there is something in the Christian religion which makes that kind of meeting seem hardly worthy of the genius of our faith. Instead, it would seem the obvious thing that men, when they come together, should face squarely the real task of their particular church, and see wherein they could help in performing that task. Let them find out what is the port of that church and do something to urge it on toward that port. This same suggestion would seem the natural one to apply to all societies.

It is this also that ought to be kept in mind when a pastor or a session feels that lust for organizing something which so often arises. Here are young people not doing their duty, or not properly cared for by the church. Here are children who are apparently neglected. Here is a body of young women not yet doing all they might do. What then? Of course, the first suggestion is that something be organized for them. It is a wise suggestion, unless there is already an organization which can be made vital and effective in their behalf. But the organization ought to have definite relation to the real task of the church. It ought not to be simply to hold those young people. It ought not to be simply to give them something to do for the sake of having them busy and getting them allied to the church. Organizations go to wreck easily on that principle.

Societies which are water-tight compartments and keep the church afloat already abound. The new ones ought to be made on the basis of aggression, to urge the church ahead, to bring it nearer to the completion of its task, to bring it into sight of its port. If young people are to be organized, it ought to be to do something which the church is responsible for doing. If men are to be called into organization, it ought to be to give the church an efficiency which it has not now. Organizations that look inward and are for the good of the people of the church are ordinarily feeble. Organizations that look outward toward the world and its need, whose purpose is to bring the power of the church to bear upon the world, are ordinarily strong.

Newspaper Help Against Gambling

At the risk of bodily injury from infuriated gamblers, whose pictures had just been taken, representatives of The Chicago Tribune recently took part in a daring exposure of a gambling place on the West side of Chicago. The action was taken after protests from parents and wives had come to The Tribune office. In commenting on the taking of this evidence that gambling exists in Chicago the paper editorially assails gambling as "an insidious evil, which, beginning with the insignificant matching of pennies, grows in many natures to a passion as devouring and destroying as an incurable disease. The gambling den is the school of the pickpocket, the hangout of the panderer. It is the starting point of the wife deserter. Its victims are its slaves, with their perjury, with their ballots and their vote frauds." The connection of gambling dens with politicians and organized vice is also exposed.

Such vigorous denunciation and action by the papers of every city of the land would soon drive out open gambling, although it never can be eradicated until boys are taught in their homes the evil of the most petty gambling and mothers and sisters refuse to participate in games of chance for prizes. It is to be hoped that the ministers of the land will use their influence in encouraging such efforts to expose gambling, specially by letting the newspapers with such courage know that they are being supported.

The Famishing Cry of "Bhuki Atma"

In the biography of her husband Mrs. G. L. Wharton tells of an experience during the famine times in India which is most suggestive. Cutting themselves to the very quick in order to have food for others, she and her husband found it necessary to seclude themselves for their own meals in order to have strength to go back to their work. It happened one day, however, that as they sat at their meager meal on a porch shielded by vines, the leaves of the passion vine were pushed aside by bony fingers and a famished face appeared with the cry, "Bhuki atma!" It is an idiomatic phrase which means a hungry soul. The first thought of this hungry soul was for physical food.

And yet there is a deep cry that is underneath it. It is a cry that tends to be drowned out in the midst of other cries of this time. In the hurry to supply the wants of the body, in the rush to render the service needed for the life that now is, it is easy to miss the cry of hungry souls. Indeed, it takes a certain amount of will power to realize that they still exist. So much is said of hungry bodies, that hungry souls have almost passed out of our talk. We are accenting temporal things until eternal conditions are not much accented. It is important, however, that we keep plainly in mind that there are hungry souls in well-fed bodies, and that there are famished lives in houses of plenty.

There are many thoughtful men who believe that rich people are more neglected spiritually today than poor people. Certainly it is much more difficult for the average minister to be faithful to the spiritual needs of men of affluence than to the needs of men of poverty. He finds it exceedingly difficult to go to the office of an ungodly bank president and seek to supply the hunger of his soul. There seems to be no hunger. The banker seems to be fully supplied. Actually he may be in far worse condition than his own chauffeur. Many an office boy has supplies which the head of the house sorely lacks. We sound again the old plea—that we do not miss the cry of the hungry soul. We do not minimize in the slightest the splendid new emphasis, in which indeed we have tried to have our full part. We only remind ourselves and all our readers of the fact that there are still hungry souls, which will not be helped by clean streets and better legislation and higher wages. They will be helped instead only by the Bread of Life, which is given to us to give to the world.

Early Church Connections of Livingstone

Rev. J. Brand Crombie, minister of the Congregational church in Blantyre, Scotland, writes to The Continent of his desire to erect in the old home town of David Livingstone a Livingstone memorial church within this centennial year of the immortal missionary's birth. The local congregation is not of sufficient strength to build the church alone, but Dr. Crombie believes that evangelical Christians throughout the world will be interested in seeing such a Livingstone shrine provided at his birthplace to be not only a repository of mementos of his life but more particularly a center for gospel ministry in the whole neighborhood which is hallowed by association with Livingstone's name.

In the missionary's boyhood there was no Congregational church in Blantyre, but his family attended the church at Hamilton, three miles eastward, where his father was a deacon. David himself frequently went to another church at Cambuslang, three miles west, and it was his friends there who afterwards provided the support for his native helper, Mabalwe, by whom he was rescued from the lion that was crunching his shoulder. At Hamilton David had another most useful friend, Arthur Anderson, who, though but a coachman, had influence enough in the community to raise the money by which the young man was enabled to travel to London and offer himself there as a candidate before the London Missionary Society for appointment to foreign service.

Dr. Crombie, who cites these interesting local details for the information of Continent readers, ministers to a church which has, as all this shows, been organized since Livingstone's time, but it has the right of immediate locality to designate it as the appropriate custodian of a Livingstone memorial. Already a few Americans have contributed to the project, which is under the patronage of the Congregational leaders of both Scotland and England, and Dr. Crombie anticipates that American admiration for Livingstone will bring him other aid from this side of the Atlantic.

—That amazingly vigorous patriarch of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Bishop Thomas Bowman, has just celebrated his ninety-sixth birthday. Though he retired from active work a decade ago, the bishop is still a familiar figure on the streets of Orange, New Jersey, the city of his abode, and continues his live interest in religious affairs. Even before he was made a bishop, forty-one years ago, Dr. Bowman had to his credit as an educator what with many men would be considered a life career, and had been chaplain of the United States senate for two years during the Lincoln administration. The good bishop was indeed worthy of the great number of congratulatory messages that came from everywhere on the occasion of his anniversary.

—There is a neat little sermon in an item in The Continent's financial department of last week. Treasury notes issued by the Mexican government sold at 92⅞—considerably below par—in spite of the fact that they bore liberal interest. But Mexico has been in a state of turmoil, with a lack of stable government, and investors are not sure of its future course. The young man in college or out of it who is known for his lack of stable character, who has not learned to control his temper and is generally unsystematic, is discounted by the world. He is at a disadvantage in the race of life as compared with those with opposite characteristics.

—Dr. Herbert B. Gwyn has resigned as editor of The Churchman, after a brief service in that position, and is temporarily succeeded by Rev. Charles K. Gilbert, secretary of the New York diocese social service commission. Dr. Gwyn, who resigned a Chicago pastorate to undertake editorial work, will return to the active ministry. Differences with respect to editorial management, arising in the controlling company, are reported to have made Dr. Gwyn's position untenable. Newspaper reports intimate that a more vigorous advocacy of "low church" policies is demanded by the clergymen and laymen who own the paper.

—It is to be hoped that it will not be necessary, following the Richmond (Virginia) example, to place under arrest many women who wear the latest extreme style of skirts. Social workers will probably agree with the arraignment of women's dress made recently before the Chicago ministers by Miss Mary Bartelme, assistant to Judge Pinckney of the juvenile court. She expressed the fear that little could be done toward improving the morals of young men so long as young women are permitted by their mothers to ape the styles of the women of the underworld.

—An inmate of one of the Illinois asylums for the insane is suing for his liberty. He is reported to have earned the money for lawyers' fees partly by solving newspaper puzzles. On investigation it would probably be found that other inmates are earning their way to a trial for liberty by originating "humorous" cartoons for Sunday supplements.

—During his summer in Great Britain Dr. Jowett has been preaching to congregations that overflowed the meeting places. At Manchester people began to assemble two hours before the hour for service. Dr. C. W. Gordon ("Ralph Connor") also is finding British audiences gratifyingly responsive.

—Sometimes a good man, if he is forced into thorough introspection, discovers that where he has taken pride in "sticking up" for a principle against the advice of others he has only been giving a demonstration of his own egotism and (by him) unsuspected selfishness.

—The difference between assailing a wrong and attacking the man who commits it is that the wrong can never be right, while the man may redeem his errors. The genuine Christian impulse is to condemn the thing and to help the man to do better.

—A good deal of bluster that is justified by its exhibitors as "righteous indignation" is really only the same nasty temper that impels a man to beat a horse.

The Gadflies of the Press

BY FRANCIS E. CLARK

Dr. Clark's travels as president of the World's Christian Endeavor Union bring him in contact with all phases of national and international thought. Apropos of the celebration of the century of peace between America and Great Britain, he writes some keen words concerning an existing obstacle to good will between English-speaking peoples. Dr. Clark frankly says, in a note to the editor of The Continent: "I presume no American traveler in Europe stays there for any length of time without being 'riled' by what the English dailies have to say about America. This has afforded me a chance to let off a little steam."

I AM ANXIOUS, as I believe most Americans are, for a good understanding between Old England and the New England which has spread over the North American continent. The animosities that made Americans hate the English a century ago are largely things of the past. I have heard a company of Englishmen join in singing "America" at the foot of Bunker Hill monument, and then heard the Americans join with their visitors in "God Save the King."

The celebration of the "century of peace" will largely wipe out the little rancor that remains from the memories of Yorktown, Saratoga and Lundy's Lane, and yet there is something left to be desired before there can be the completely genial and cordial relations between the two countries which is so much better than ententes and alliances.

To secure these altogether cordial relations I venture to say there must be a change on the part of certain writers, who are supposed to represent the public opinion of their respective countries. I may be prejudiced, but I honestly believe that certain English writers are the greatest sinners in this respect. To be sure, there are some swashbucklers of the press in America who, for the sake of the "Irish vote," or for some more inscrutable reason, are always ready to twist the lion's tail; but there are very few such newspapers or politicians, and I very seldom see an unfair or sneering remark about Great Britain in reputable American newspapers, or hear one from a reputable public speaker.

Sneers at Americans from Time of Dickens

On the other hand, sneers at America and Americans have been the stock in trade of many writers from the early days of Dickens and Mrs. Trollope to the present year of grace. The sarcastic pleasantries of Dickens and Trollope, which sometimes, in the latter writer, descended to downright vilification, have largely been forgotten. Americans are not so thin-skinned as they used to be, though for my part I never could understand why they should be accused of too great sensitiveness because they resented the wholesale criticisms of such authors. Another class of writers has succeeded to their mantles, however, who seem resolved to sting the American cuticle like gnats, even if they do not slash it in the old-fashioned way.

Being obliged to be much in continental Europe, I frequently read the papers that the hotels afford, which are almost invariably of the Conservative variety. A Liberal paper is rarely seen in a continental hotel or cafe. The Standard is perhaps the favorite, with The Daily Telegraph a close second, though the cheaper price of The Paris Daily Mail seems to be edging its older contemporaries out of many of their former haunts. In these excellent papers I seldom see an article thoroughly complimentary to America, and I do see many articles which have their fling at American manners, American business, American pronunciation, American heiresses, above all at America's supposed servility to the golden calf.

These criticisms frequently find their way into American newspapers, and though they are often dismissed with a joke, or a tu quoque, they cannot help having their influence in keeping alive any lingering resentments that may be reminiscent of 1776 or 1812. To be sure, the sting of a mosquito is no very serious affair, unless it be the pestilential variety that carries yellow fever or malaria in its little dagger, and we brush it away with the flip of the finger. Nevertheless, one does not like to be stung, and one is likely to avoid localities where mosquitoes abound.

Editors Seem to Have Distorted Idea of News

It may be said that the uncomplimentary things about America are mostly matters of news; and if America does not wish such things published to the world, she must reform her manners and her morals. I admit that there is truth in this, but at the same time the question arises, "What is news?" Is an unsavory divorce case, or a terrible railway catastrophe, or a horrible lynching the only news? In the doings and disasters of a hundred millions of people it is easy, undoubtedly, to find such "news," but is this the only kind worth recording? I have sometimes thought this was the opinion of certain editors, as I have searched the endless columns of some metropolitan journals for news from my own country.

It is the settled conviction of many Americans who read English newspapers that American crimes and disasters, murders and embezzlements, are chosen by some editors to fill their columns in order that the British public may be warned against the careless and criminal and foolish people who live on the other side of the Atlantic. Doubtless this is not the reason for the publication of this "news," but its disproportionate amount gives some color to the opinion. Sometimes the "news" of the day from America is a mere puerile bit of gossip, which gives the impression that the correspondent, being out of dreadful thrillers and horrible examples for the time being, had made up a silly joke and palmed it off on an unsuspecting public as a typical Americanism. For instance, one day some years ago as I searched the columns of The Thunderer for some news from America, the only reference that I found to affairs in all the forty-eight states and territories was a six-line paragraph, with a black-letter headline, to the effect that a man in Connecticut had been arrested the day before for kissing his wife upon the street. This was a belated joke from the days of the blue laws of Connecticut. It may possibly have been news 200 years ago, but certainly not within the last century.

However, it is not the "news," though its porportions often seem distorted and grotesque, that pricks American sensibilities, callous as they ought to be by this time, but the editorial comments on the news, or the contributed articles about the States, that they most seriously resent. When Canadian Pacific stock goes down, it is more than intimated that it is due to "the dishonest methods of the New York Stock Exchange." When strikers become especially belligerent I have seen it accounted for by the fact that they are taking a leaf out of the frightful book of American labor troubles. When a peculiarly atrocious murder is committed we are assured that "scarcely anything more fiendish could be expected in the southern states of North America."

From a recent article in The Daily Mail I quote the following choice extracts, which are samples of scores of such articles which I have seen within the last few years. The writer speaks first of "the protracted and ineffectual murder trials, the 'graft,' deftly eluding prosecution, the short weights and adulteration of food, the Gilbert and Sullivan farcicalities that go on in every city hall in America," and we are willing to admit, with humility and contrition of spirit, that there is a measure of truth in these sweeping generalities, while not willing to admit that we are sinners above all others. The writer then proceeds to generalize as follows about the children and young people of America:

Typical English Comment on American Life

"In the first place all your nephews and nieces here talk the English of 'Chimmie Fadden' and 'Huckleberry Finn.' Children are not brought up in nurseries; that would do injury to their 'rights.' They eat dinner when their fathers eat, and where they eat. The children, in their constant contact with the denizens of the servant hall and the casual 'Huckleberry Finns' of life, would deem it very wounding to the latter to allow to come to the surface any marks of superiority such as differentiate the speech of the classes from the masses in other countries. That the young lady in the parlor car ordering luncheon of stewed lamb should have referred to it as 'stoo' matters not so much. Fuller knowledge might eradicate that at any time of life, but I fear the indescribable dissyllable into which she transformed 'le-amb' will hang to her till her dying day.

"The only assertion of superiority permitted here is in the display of the dollar—displayed merely as a trophy, as won by skill at a game. The magnificent palaces, whose unfenced lawns line the expensive avenues, are permitted to proclaim stridently, 'Awarded for preeminent skill in the wheat pit!' or 'Won in the petroleum Marathon!" but not many further privileges are granted with them. The owner may not wound his servants by calling them aught but 'hired help,' nor may his children be permitted to learn ways much other than theirs, under risk of public offense."

This is but one of scores of such articles that I have read in certain London journals within the last few years. Scarcely one of these writers has been able to get through a column without alluding to the supposed American fetish, the almighty dollar.

One would think that in America alone, of all the countries in the world, and in the last century of all centuries since the commencement of recorded time, money and the power that money brings were desired and sought; least of all that in Great Britain there could be anyone who would soil his hands with filthy lucre! These writers conveniently forget that in the United States ninety-nine people out of a hundred are poor, or only moderately well-to-do. They forget that the "four hundred" are almost literally numbered in this designation, and that the other ninety-odd millions of people, the great majority, are not bitten by the gold bug but cherish lofty ideals for themselves and for their children; and try to realize them. These writers overlook the hundreds of thousands of ministers, professors and public school teachers who have chosen professions that give no hope of large wealth; the physicians, most of them poor men, whose ambitions would be sadly thwarted if they sought chiefly money; and the vast multitude of traders and mechanics who seek only a comfortable fireside and a happy, virtuous home.

I did not set out, however, to defend America but simply to call attention to a source of international irritation which it seems to me might easily be avoided.

Travelers Give Offense by Comments

Next to these newspapers perhaps the traveling Englishman is the source of greatest irritation to the American. He is often so serenely unconscious that any good thing can come out of the American Nazareth or indeed from any country save British Judea.

"Are there many Americans in Egypt now?" asked a friend of mine to her vis-a-vis at a steamer table on the Mediterranean.

"Yes," replied the Englishman, "and I am sorry to say we can always tell them by their manners and their nasal accent."

"Did you ever realize that we can always tell you by your manners and by your accent, which sounds equally outlandish to us?" replied the high-spirited little American woman.

"No, really now, can you?" replied the Englishman in amazement. It was an entirely novel idea to him, and seemed to afford him food for reflection for many an hour.

On another steamer of the French Messargeries line, as we were making the slow loops that took us to the different Mediterranean ports on the coast of Syria and Asia Minor, a bright little English boy, traveling with his mother, attracted the attention of an American lady, who said to him, "Do you speak French?"

"No, but I wish I could," was the reply.

"Perhaps you speak American?" continued the lady.

"Oh, no!" replied the little lad with emphasis; "mamma says it's very nahsty to speak American"—a feeling shared, it would seem, by many traveling Englishmen.

I am inclined to think that this lack of understanding of the fact that Englishmen may seem as queer to Americans as Americans do to Englishmen accounts for not a few of the gadfly stings, both in conversation and in print, and that very few are in malice.

There is still discernible the "certain condescension to foreigners" of which Lowell speaks, but it is largely an unconscious condescension. I have more often heard this condescension hotly resented by colonials in Canada and Australia than by Americans, though perhaps it is scarcely worthy of notice, since it is evidently so unconscious and free from malice prepense.

As one who was born on Canadian soil, though a full-blooded American, since all my remoter ancestors from Pilgrim times have lived in the United States, and as one who glories in English history and achievements, and who cherishes a profound and sincere regard for the British character, I may be allowed perhaps to write these reflections on the gadflies in the English press. I realize that there are papers, perhaps many of them, that always treat America fairly and generously. Let us hope, for the sake of the good relations we would all see firmly established after these hundred years of peace, that the press of both countries will recognize the good and cease to exaggerate the evil, and thus do its part to promote another century of unbroken concord.

Resolutions Resolved Into Nothing

BY PRESBUTEROS CYNICUS

AS A BOY I was passionately fond of the hymn "I'm a pilgrim, and I'm a stranger." The tune had a haunting melody. It stayed by one. But the throne of the hymn was usurped and its melodious crown made jingling tinsel when the irreverent college world adapted it to the idiotic words—

> "I'm a June bug, and I'm a Katydid.
> I can buzz and butt my head against the wall!"

Now one cannot hear the tune without recalling these "forlorn hope" words.

For several years a number of men in our presbytery have been trying to storm the sessions of the churches and secure a systematization of their missionary committee activities—using the latter word as a euphemistic expression of hope rather than as a correct characterization of conditions.

But these sessions aforesaid have been securely intrenched behind escarpments of hide-bound tradition—deep, stagnant moats of opinionated self-satisfaction—citadel walls of inertia. Thus, after storming the pastoral skirmish line and outposts, sometimes insidiously admitted within the lines by a secret friend, we have found the missionary committee still impregnable in its last defenses, and inertia has been our destruction.

Its vast power can be inferred from its having resisted the onslaughts of Laymen's Missionary Movement, Men's Movement for Missions, enthusiastic individual initiative, Men and Religion impetus, and even, here and there, pastoral appeal.

In a particular church, that shall be nameless, the attempt was made to repeat the Valley of Dry Bones mystery play.

At first the attack seemed crowned with victory. Unanimous reorganization of the missionary committee was Resolved and spread upon the minutes (that vast cemetery of the church). The committee of session was to take on men of the congregation as members, was to confer and cooperate with the women's and other missionary organizations, and was to adopt methods of informing the members of the congregation as to the needs, progress, opportunities and privileges of missionary endeavor!

The Men's Movement for Missions sang the "Te Deum," notified other churches that Lofty Heights church had capitulated and that an offensive and defensive alliance was formed with its great army.

This unhatched-chicken census had the usual fate. The military operations of months, the victorious assault, the capitulatory resolution, once the missionary enemy disbanded its troops, all went for naught. How, you ask? The missionary committee did not convene. It treated the resolution as New Year's chaff, and again intrenching itself in Fort Inertia, hung out a banner, "We're doing well enough now"—and there you are.

Men of the Presbyterian churches, this is a true case. Is it an exceptional one? Is the fact that this particular church gives tens of thousands a fact that excuses its sin of inertia?

If 20 per cent of its people give those tens of thousands, is it relieved of the responsibility of informing and inspiring the 80 per cent to share and perhaps to double its privilege as a "channel of benevolence"?

Is it unfair to characterize this inertia as a church sin of omission—or of foreign mission?

Is it unjust to try to drop a bomb of sarcasm from the aeroplane of wider vision?

Has not the presbytery episcopal power to require a sort of civil service test for membership in session committees on missions?

To change the figure, many of these committees constitute bunkers that can be played over only by a brassy faced back so as to look vertically upward.

A new "greens committee" ought to be created to change some of the hazards.

The Final Faith

BY EDWARD D. MORRIS

There lies no large religion, Man, in the chemistry of sod;
He who delves for God in Nature, will never unearth God.
Nor canst thou create religion—easier to make a star;
It must flow down upon thee, from some loftier Life afar.
From that far Life descending, through the shadows, through the mist,
To fulfill our human longing, comes the one transcendent Christ.
And in his gracious hands, O Man, behold a Book divine;
Truth, wisdom, goodness, life supreme in every lustrous line.
He kissed my forehead once; and that supernal breath
Forever proved for me each word that the Immanuel saith.
His saving faith at heart, no mental stress or doubting more,
In peace I wait to hear his footstep at the opening Door.

Appearance's Sake

Of course everything must be neat and shipshape aboard a private yacht. A writer in The Mariner's Advocate tells the story of the captain of a sloop who crossed the deck in a hurry, seemingly very much perplexed. A lady guest stopped him and asked what the trouble was.

"The fact is, ma'am," he said, "our rudder's broken."

"Oh, is that all? I shouldn't worry about that," said the lady. "Being under water nearly all the time, no one will notice it."

Good Fruit from Stony Ground

BY BRUCE BARTON

This is the story of a man, a murder, an institution and an army of paroled convicts. It is the story, too, of a second man, unjustly sentenced to fifteen years in Sing Sing prison, who accepted his sentence as a call of God; prayed for them that persecuted him and preached the gospel to them that despitefully used him. The moral of the story is that stone walls do not a prison make—necessarily; they may make a church if there be a man with a message

"Craps" in the Alley—the Boys' First Lesson in Gambling

WHILE your foot is on the first step a shabby individual stops in front of the house, glances at the number and then rushes up the stairs in front of you.

"Is Mr. Rodgers in?" he asks the man at the door, and murmurs a tense "Thank God!" when the answer is yes. After a moment he is ushered into Mr. Rodgers's room.

"Mr. Rodgers, I'm just out of Sing Sing. I can't find no work. I'm up against it."

The man whom he has called Rodgers turns on him a glance of keen scrutiny. He has the appearance of a man not easily fooled, this Mr. Rodgers. He is medium tall, a little broad for his height, and it seems as though his body had been poured hot into his clothes and pounded down hard. There is no quiver of fat when he moves, only the swift, sure move of muscles well kept. His eyes are keen but kindly.

"Where did you sleep last night?" he asks.

"In the park."

"What was your bit?"

"Ten months."

"What for?"

"'Sault and battery."

"Who sent you here?"

"Well, I met a bloke as told me you was the fellow that helps fellows like us. And"—a sudden fear seizing him—"Mr. Rodgers, can't you do nothing for me? Can't you?"

"Yes——"

But there, you have had a glance at the institution, the New York Prison Association, and the man, Harry Rodgers. A little later we'll look at them both again.

* * * * *

School was out for the last time and the crowd of boys fell to quarreling on the way home in the way boys do. Suddenly the largest boy in the crowd struck a smaller one across the shoulder with a stick. The smaller boy held a penknife in his hand—at the blow the blood rushed hot into his face.

"If you hit me again," he flared, "I'll kill you!"

"Oh, you will, will you?" taunted the larger boy, and struck him a harder blow.

Instantly the hand that held the knife plunged forward. There was no purpose behind the blow, no realization that serious injury had been done when the other boy sank to the ground. But the knife had buried itself in his heart. The papers which reported the incident flamingly said that the boy who had done the stabbing was named Harry Rodgers and that he was 16 years old.

"If you will plead guilty," said his lawyers, "we will get you off free." But the boy would not plead guilty. He had not meant to kill; he would not acknowledge that he had meant to. For five months they let him lie in the city prison, and then suddenly without consulting him they set him before the judge.

"You are very young," said that official, "and there is an evident lack of intent. I will be lenient with you. Sing Sing; twenty years."

Twenty years—he kept repeating it over to himself as they led him away. Twenty and sixteen were thirty-six. He would be almost a middle-aged man; he might die before the sentence expired. Better that he should die at once, and quickly, than that the soiled air of the prison should suck away his life. He would have ended it all, but they gave him no opportunity. He was shut into a cell with another man. The other was older; he, too, had killed a man, and was not sorry.

Five years of the sentence dragged themselves out in a horrible routine. The months varied little. A few days of each were spent in the regular activity of the prison, eight hours in the shops, three silent hurried periods for meals, and the long dark night in an ill-smelling cell. Then one day there would come a blow from one of the keepers, or a demand so unjust that it chafed the outraged sensibilities of the lad. He would strike out in his anger; keepers would hurl themselves upon him and he would be hurried away to the solitude of the dark cell. So his life was added to—a week in the darkness, a month with his fellows and a month in the solitude that bit into his soul—until five years had worn themselves out. And it was in the fifth year that he saw a man resting

The Human Drift—the Benches of City Parks Are the Sleeping Places of Many of the Homeless upon a bundle of overalls in the corner of the prison tailor shop.

Something about the dignity and restraint of the man, some unusual look in his face, appealed to Rodgers.

"Who's the new one?" he asked one of the inmates.

"Don't know his name. He's got fifteen years."

It struck the chord of pity in Rodgers's heart, a chord that had not vibrated for many months. He could not forget this new man, who seemed so much a gentleman. And to think that he had fifteen years!

One day he went forward haltingly and held out his hand.

"I'm sorry for you," he said; "you're in for fifteen and I got twenty. I'm sorry for you."

"Oh, don't be sorry for me," said the other. "I don't mind it. I'm innocent. They'll find it out in a year or two. And I think I'd just as soon be here for a year or two."

Rodgers Comes in Contact with a New Influence

"You don't care!" Rodgers repeated the phrase in a dazed monotone. "You're innocent and you don't care, and you'd just as soon be in Sing Sing for a year or two——"

"I would," said the new man. "I think God has some work for me here."

With an amazed stare on his face Rodgers backed off, but the thought of the new man would not leave his mind. There came to be a sort of fascination for him in the man who could bear an unjust sentence in a spirit so unruffled. He, Rodgers, who was guilty, whose five years had been one long turmoil of insurrection, found himself drawn almost irresistibly to this other, whose character seemed to have in it all the elements of strength which his own had so notably lacked. Finally, using the underground wires of prison influence which five years had taught him to manipulate, he arranged it so that the new man was put into the same cell with him.

A long time they talked together that first night before they prepared themselves for bed. Then the other man said, "I'm going to pray; don't you want to kneel down and pray too?"

"Pray?" said Rodgers. "I don't pray. It don't do no good to pray."

"It does," said the new man.

"It don't," retorted Rodgers.

"I'll prove to you that it does," the new man replied. And he did.

After that they knelt down together and Rodgers, who had not prayed in years, sent up a halting, disjointed plea for help and forgiveness.

Prisoners of the State of New York Watching Field Sports on Decoration Day

Way the Man Lived Told on Companions

Day by day they worked together in the shops, ate their silent meals and returned at night to the barred squalor and filth of their cell. The new man made no effort to impose his ideas on the other prisoners. He sought no opportunity to talk to them except as they spoke with him. His effort was not at all to do something, merely to be something. And from day to day the influence of that life was visible on the lives around. Other men besides Rodgers felt it—there was a real movement for righteousness within the walls of Sing Sing. And when the movement was at its height the man whose simple fidelity had inspired it was pardoned and went out.

He left a different Rodgers behind. The chaplain who talked with Rodgers announced that he had "had a change of heart." Some of the inmates, preferring their own explanation, offered the opinion that his "bit had twisted his nut." Instead of his former pugnacity there appeared humility—a patient eagerness to be useful took the place of his old ruthless selfishness. The life of the other man lived again in Rodgers, whom he had trained, and its influence grew through seven more years. Then Rodgers himself went out.

The law had done all that it could to free him, but he was still not free. His heart was behind the bars with the men he had known there—every day, as they were released, men came to him confident that in some way Rodgers could be counted on to help. His days were carrying a double burden of work—his own job and the problems of his friends—when officers of the New York Prison Association came to him and said: "We have 600 boys a year paroled to us from Elmira. And men from Sing Sing come too. Those boys and men need you—we need you. Come with us."

How a Man Feels When Released from Prison

You may remember perhaps the time when you had typhoid fever and were away from your job for three months. The office seemed very strange when you got back to it—your hands moved bunglingly; people in the office said kind things to you, but you felt with an instinctive dread that the kind words were said to cover up pity.

Remember that feeling if you will. Imagine that your illness had cost you your position, so that instead of having a place to go back to you were compelled to go forth in search of work. Imagine a general feeling of suspicion concerning you instead of the spirit of friendliness which you met. Imagine that and you have some idea of the way the boy feels who is paroled from Elmira or Sing Sing. If you want to know how he looks go over some Thursday night to the prison association and listen while the boys bring in their reports to Mr. Rodgers.

Here is a narrow-chested little fellow. There is weakness rather than viciousness in his face. For almost a year he has been coming and the period of his parole is about over—in another month he will be eligible for his "absolute." The face still is weak and always will be, but there is a look of determination that was not there a year ago. For the first time in his life he has held a job for a year. He is beginning to realize within himself possibilities that he had not known were there. He has won the love of a girl, and he brings her picture to show Mr. Rodgers. There is a ring of pride in his voice, where a year ago was only indifference.

A big, strapping lad steps in as he leaves. Yes, he has found the job that Mr. Rodgers sent him to. Yes, he went to church last Sunday. Yes, he has written his mother and heard from her—she may come down to see him this week. She says that no one in the home town knows that he stole the money and has been serving time. Does Mr. Rodgers think he could go home for a couple of days this summer if the concern gives him a vacation? It would be fine. He's going to make good, sure. Sure.

All day new ones come in, the allotment of boys from Elmira, who report to Mr. Rodgers in fulfillment of their parole, and chance individuals from Sing Sing and other prisons who hear in one way or another that there is a fellow named Rodgers in New York who "cares for stiffs that's down and out." And Mr. Rodgers from early morning until late night meets them, speaks kindly to them, gets them clothes and jobs and helps to look after their families during the first days of their employment. With a hundred bands he binds them up to decency and good citizenship. For every influence that is reaching out to pull them down he balances a good influence. And when the balance still quivers, uncertain which way to turn, he throws into it prodigally his own heart and patience and an understanding of their needs that is measureless. And it turns.

To any casual observer the prison association is a tremendously interesting exhibit. But to the man who likes to run his hand down below the surface of an institution, until he feels the quiver of the divine hand underneath, there is in the prison association a fascination that transcends mere interest. For nowhere in the world is there a better example of the fine frugality of God—the parsimony that will let nothing be wasted, that turns even the wrath of man to praise him. A boy who killed another boy and was sent for twenty years to Sing Sing prison; a man accused unjustly of a crime and sent for fifteen years to Sing Sing—these seem no promising materials out of which to build a work of blessedness. Yet by these very instruments the work of the New York Prison Association has been made doubly effective. The bit of warped, misshapen seed which fell on the stony ground of Sing Sing is bearing fruit each year more than six hundred fold. The crumb that was picked up there has multiplied until already it has fed lives that number more than half 5,000.

The Little Shopkeeper's Dress

BY ELIZABETH PRICE

SHE WAS a very busy person at best. First of all, there was the shop—little enough, to be sure, and with a stock of cotton and calicoes, needles and pins, so small it seemed like a comical miniature of the big stores farther down the avenue. Over its door there hung a bell which tinkled whenever the knob turned, and every time the bell tinkled the little shopkeeper flew to answer its summons. She had to—there was no other way about it. For when bread and butter for two hungry "kinder" and an old "groszmutter" must be provided by the sale of "notions" it behooves one to be both prompt and polite—both of which the little shopkeeper undoubtedly was.

Back of the shop were two tiny rooms—as sweet and tidy as rooms could be—and back of these a wee kitchen, where gingerbread horses and doughnut men were mixed and baked, then carried out front to tempt customers with their lusciousness. They did it, too. In fact, Mrs. Hucke would have told you that but for this fragrant procession from kitchen to shop the family could hardly have been satisfied on the bread and butter question. But the one pair of hands had everything to do, whether in front room or kitchen, and they were not large hands, either.

That was why her sewing got behind. Her own, of course. The two boys were kept as spick and span as crisp gingham blouses could make them, while the groszmutter's caps were always ruffled and crimped. But somehow it seemed as though the print dress pattern waiting in the sewing basket would never, never get made up, though Mrs. Hucke needed it badly and was forced to wear her black alpaca of afternoons as well as Sundays.

"It's a pity," she said to herself, shaking her head and looking as sober as a round bright face and two twinkling black eyes could look. "There's no knowing when there'll be another black alpaca, once this is worn out. Yet a person must look tidy for the store." She paused to pin her old-fashioned gold brooch in place, then added—still soberly: "If only one of my boys was a girl, now, and a bit older, she might even make it up for her mother. But, there, whatever am I saying? As if I'd change one hair of their blessed heads! The way'll open for us to get what we need—it always has and it's sure to, still." She was singing as she went a moment later to the kitchen for a tray of ginger pound cakes—singing softly but as cheerily as ever, "In some way or other, the Lord will provide." And the two fair-haired lads over their blocks in the corner joined lustily in the chorus.

That was on Grand Avenue near its unfashionable end. Over on Chestnut street, somewhat nearer the stylish part of the city, the Pleasure Club was assembling in weekly session. "Can't anybody think of something new?" demanded Susanne Conkling after greetings were over. "I'm so sick of Irish crochet I could toss this collar to Jericho."

"Why not vary your occupation, my dear? Irish crochet, as an adjunct of the Pleasure Club, is not obligatory." Eva raised her eyebrows with a slightly superior air.

"That's where you are mistaken," Susanne assured her. "I haven't another piece of portable work and this collar has accompanied me to these meetings till I'm beginning to dread Tuesday afternoon on its account. Even pleasures pall if applied too freely."

"So they do," Irene agreed. "This has certainly palled on me—if, indeed, it could ever have been described as a pleasure," and the speaker shook out a square of linen whereon exaggerated daisies and impossible roses rioted in reckless profusion. "I'm no embroiderer, anyway," she scolded, surveying the design with disapproving eyes. "I'm aching for a straight seam or a sensible hem."

Josephine laughed. "Don't scowl so, child," she admonished. "It's most unbecoming to your peculiar style of beauty. What's come over us, anyway, today?"

"I'm sure I don't know." Elise's tone was discontented. "We used to have such good times together, but lately our meetings have seemed so—so——"

"Flat, stale and unprofitable," finished Josephine grandly, adding, "What shall we do about it—quit?"

"No, indeed," said Gladys promptly. "All we need is stirring up to set us going again."

"Easier said than done. It would take more than a pudding stick or an egg beater to accomplish that. Brains, madam, brains would be required to land this company safely out of the Slough of Despond." A chorus of laughter greeted this lucid speech and Jessie retired behind her braid work in some confusion.

Josephine looked up earnestly. "Truly, girls, we do need a change," she said. "I believe we need to be less selfish, somehow. I was thinking about it yesterday, how we are always clamoring for something new and entertaining. Nothing satisfies us long. Maybe we have too many good times—maybe we don't appreciate them!"

"What a foolish remark! How can a person have too many good times?" demanded Gladys, half indignantly.

"Very easily. Just as you can get indigestion from eating too many chocolate creams." Irene spoke with decision, born of experience, but Elise clapped her hands.

"Chocolate creams remind me of ginger pound cakes and this is the afternoon for Mrs. Hucke to make fresh ones. Pass over your nickels, girls, and we'll have refreshments here in less than no time that will banish the grumps for true."

"They melt in your mouth," assented Irene, sorting out a half-dozen pennies from her skeins of floss.

"Bright idea. Glad you remembered," and Gladys passed a dime with willing fingers.

"Well, Jessie, I appoint you custodian of my reputation while I am gone. Don't let 'em criticise my centerpiece, I beg," and Elise fled, laughing, from the shower of protests her final remark called forth.

She was gone a long time, and when she returned she carried under her arm a round bundle that apparently bore no relationship to the fragrant contents of her big paper bag.

"Waited for them to grow, didn't you?" demanded Eva severely.

"Yes, literally. They easily doubled in size while I waited. Here, Jess, pass them while I get my breath and a drink of water. See this package, girls?"

"Having two eyes apiece, all in working order, we cannot deny that it is distinctly visible."

"Well, it is a calico dress—or will be when the Pleasure Club has finished its work."

"Wha-a-at?"

"Yes, it's Mrs. Hucke's. We are to make it from first to last and return it to its owner, ready to wear."

"Elise Carter, you are jesting."

"Lucile Jennings, I am in dead, sober earnest. Here's a paper pattern with a picture on it that the dress must look like when it's finished," and Elise displayed the neat cut.

"Do tell us what you mean. Half told news spoils my appetite and Gladys will have those cakes devoured before our eyes if somebody doesn't interrupt her. Go on, Elise."

"I've already been, honey. Give me those scissors, Lucile."

"My patience, she's going to cut the woman's goods up. Somebody hold her hands while I telephone for the ambulance."

"How did you get hold of it, Elise? Surely that shopkeeper, ignorant as she is, never had the nerve to ask such a thing."

Elise eyed the speaker severely. "She's not ignorant, she's dear. She didn't ask me to do it—she doesn't know we're going to—but we are. Listen! You'd have done just what I did, girls, if you had been there and you'll have to help me out. She'd had this goods since Christmas—somebody gave it to her then. She needs her dress very, very much, and she's wearing out her poor best black alpaca because she hasn't this."

"Surely we are under no obligations to bring up other people's neglected duties. Why doesn't she make it herself?"

"Because over at her house there are only twenty-four hours in the day, and they are all full. Two dear little bits of kiddies to do everything for, an invalid grandmother to nurse and the living to make for the four of them."

"I knew you were staying a long time, but I didn't suppose you were climbing the Hucke family tree," giggled Josephine.

"I wasn't—only a branch or two," was the serene rejoinder. "The ginger cakes were just in the oven when I went in—she'd sold out the first lot—and she asked me back to wait till they baked. I went with alacrity, for I'd often longed to get a good view of those quaint little rooms. They were too cute for anything—candlesticks, Delft plates and copper teakettle—and everything was shining. The old Dutch grandmother in her wheel chair matched all the rest. Mrs. Hucke talks so well you'd hardly take her for a foreigner, but the old lady can't speak English at all, and she's so crippled up she can't do a thing. But she nodded and smiled as happily as if she had been a member of the Pleasure Club."

"Elise, you always do get mixed when you tell things, but we follow your meaning, though at a respectful distance. What has

"But," the Cold-Water Word

By Helen A. Hawley

KATE UPSON stood, as many an intelligent unmarried woman stands, a little on the outer rim of affairs. She was an observer rather than a participator, and her position made her a bit of a moralizer. Her moralizings were so interesting and enlightening, however, that Katherine, her namesake and niece, never became tired of them.

"Yes," Miss Kate was saying, "I often call the little word 'but' the politely disparaging word. Polite, because it does not distinctly contradict. Usually a measure of agreement comes first, then 'but' turns the scale of opinion, and throws cold water over one's enthusiasm. It really hurts more than a flat contradiction would.

"For instance, it happened the other day when I was at Mrs. Ewing's that two of those foreign girls who sell laces about the country were showing their wares. Harriet was interested in getting something to trim a summer gown, and the prices were fair enough. Mrs. Ewing and I didn't pay much attention, as we were chatting on other topics. Harriet isn't a judge of laces and she bought a few yards. When Betty Harrison came in Harriet, eager as girls are, showed her purchase. "Aren't they pretty?" she cried. "And handmade!"

"I saw Betty pursing up her mouth as she fingered the lace.

"'Yes, indeed, it is very pretty, but this isn't handmade.'

"'Well, then, she lied.'

"Betty was right about the lace; it wasn't handmade. The trouble is, it was spoiled forever in Harriet's eyes. She will use it, for she can't afford to throw away money. But she will never wear the gown without thinking of it. Now, the lace was well worth what she paid, and good enough for her purpose. Her little illusion about it did herself no harm, nor anyone else, except the girl who sold it.

"Here's another case in point. Not long ago I was calling on Mrs. Henderson. Another caller was present also, and Mrs. Henderson was showing us over her beautiful new house, about as complete a house as I ever saw, by the way. After we had duly admired everything the other woman said, 'But I prefer a house to face the east.' I saw a wave of color sweep over Mrs. Henderson's face, and she answered with slightly more emphasis than was necessary, 'We chose a western exposure because I take great delight in sunsets.' The added emphasis showed that the other's remark had hurt—it had found a flaw in what had been deemed perfect."

CHARMS

I hold to a cup my mother gave me
Of tears, bright tears, glad tears to save me,
Shed at my birth and ofttimes after—
Tears of pain and tears of laughter.
I lift against the shadowing years
The brilliance of her cup of tears.

Around my neck I wear forever
A chain no mortal hand can sever.
The links are pride, with honor's clasping
That mocks each tempter's evil grasping,
Against all fear enheartening me,
My father's bright integrity.

Last is this scroll my true-love proffered
When all the love her deep heart offered
Was sealed therein, its seal commanding
All truth, all trust, all understanding.
Bound fast forever on my brows
Is this phylactery of our vows.

—William Rose Benét in The Century.

Katherine was somewhat troubled by the ethics of the question.

"Still, Aunt Kate," she protested, "to go back to the lace, Betty only told the truth."

"Certainly she did, my dear, which only proves it to be the part of wisdom not to speak the truth at all times. There was no call for her to speak it then. That's the trouble with these disparaging people. They are great truth tellers, and have an extraordinary sense of justice. They have an idea the balance will be thrown out of gear unless they set the weights right. If Harriet had asked a downright question—which she didn't—then a downright answer would have been required. Please don't suspect me of encouraging falsehood. I'm a stickler for truth myself."

"I don't need to be told that, Aunt Kate," the girl laughed. "Yet you seem rather stirred up about it."

Miss Kate laughed back. "Oh, it isn't the one incident—there are hosts of them. Often, too, the person who is hurt by the remark isn't self-deceived. Say I buy a coat and it fits finely except in some minor particular. I am conscious of the one fault, yet I should prefer that my friends didn't remark upon it, even though I may be sure they see it. Why not admire and agree as far as one conscientiously can, and let the rest go, when no sacrifice of principle is involved? People ought to have some respect for the individuality of others. Yes," Miss Kate added reflectively, "I think 'but' is classified correctly. It is the politely disparaging word."

Diplomacy of Tommy

Tommy had been invited to dinner at the house of some particular people, and his mother, who was not to accompany him, was anxious about his table behavior. She gave him elaborate instructions before leaving home, and on his return made special inquiries.

"Oh, I got on all right," Tommy assured her, "at least I—I only did one thing wrong, and I couldn't help it, and I got out of that fine."

"What did you do, Tommy?"

"Oh, I was cutting my meat and it slipped off the plate on to the floor."

"Oh, my dear boy!" cried his mother in distress. "What on earth did you do then?"

"Oh, I just said, sort o' careless, 'That's always the way with tough meat,' and went on with my dinner."

How the Montessori System Works

WHEN Mrs. Dorothy Canfield Fisher came back from her latest European trip she found herself besieged by eager people clamoring to hear of her visit to the Montessori schools at Rome, and of the close friendship she had formed there with Dr. Montessori herself. "Is it really so wonderful?" they demanded, "or is it just a fad? Is it true that the children are allowed to do exactly as they please? Do they really learn to read and write so young? And isn't it very bad for them to stimulate them so unnaturally?" Most important of all—"What is there in it for our children?"

Mrs. Fisher had so much to say about it all that she decided to put it into a book, which she appropriately calls "A Montessori Mother" (Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.25 net). It has been written very simply and untechnically for the average American father and mother who want to learn, practically, how to take advantage of a system of child training that, though carried on by some experts in Rome, may be successfully adapted to the needs of a modern American household. For though this system as practiced by the Montessori schools may seem, at the first glimpse, to be new, in reality some of its basic principles have been utilized for a long time by mothers who have never even heard of Montessori, and can be put into use by any mother, just as Mrs. Fisher has put them into use with her own children.

Mrs. Fisher made her first visit to a Casa dei Bambini ("The Children's Home") after she had read Dr. Montessori's book, and decided that "this is all very well to write about, but of course it can't work anything like that in actual practice."

Seeing, however, very quickly became believing. She was taken into a large, airy room, where twenty-five children, so young that some of them seemed like real babies, were scattered all about—some at little tables, some sitting on light rugs, one lying on his back, kicking up his heels. A low, cheerful hum of talk filled the air. There seemed to be no one in charge, and it wasn't until some of the little tots had run up to smile at her and say, "Good morning!" (most of them didn't notice her at all, so absorbed were they in their "games") that she spied a "teacher" sitting on the floor beside a child—"a plainly dressed Italian woman with untroubled eyes and a look of calm certainty."

Mrs. Fisher began to watch the children and try to discover the secret of their absorption. One little boy of about 3 had been working at something ever since she entered the room, and even her sitting down beside him failed to divert him. He was holding a light wooden frame on which were stretched two pieces of cotton cloth, on one edge of which was a row of buttonholes, on the other a row of large bone buttons. He was buttoning and unbuttoning with the most intense interest. Then suddenly he stopped and looked at his little cotton waist, which also had a row of buttons—and a great idea seemed to dawn upon him. He began to button his waist! The holes were smaller and he had a hard time at first, but finally he succeeded and his face was an ecstasy of triumph. He walked across the room and lay down on a thick rug, with his hands behind his head, to rest after his great victory.

This one little episode illustrates the central idea of the Montessori system—namely, that no human being can be educated by anyone else; he must do it himself or it is never done. The prerequisite of all education is interest in the subject; add to this responsibility and absolute freedom for the exercise of individuality and you develop the self-dependence which is the most essential part of a life equipment.

When we talk about the "absolute freedom" which Montessori urges, most people begin to think of chaos and anarchy. But read Mrs. Fisher's talk on the subject and you will understand. It is all founded upon the ideal principle of democracy—"that human beings reach their highest development (and hence are of most use to society) only when for the growth of their individuality they have the utmost liberty which can be granted them without interfering with the rights of others."

As to the marvelous results Dr. Montessori attains, they seem simple and natural when one begins to understand how inevitably this system "works." Children of 5 do write with an ease and accuracy that most of our young people don't have at 8; and Mrs. Fisher tells in detail how the famous "Montessori explosion into writing" occurs. It is a perfectly spontaneous act, no one even suggesting to the child that writing is something he must learn. But the simple, solid, beautiful preparation that lies behind the act is a thing to rouse one to enthusiastic rejoicing.

"The Montessori system," declares Mrs. Fisher, "should make us think, and think hard, not only about how to teach our children the alphabet more easily, but about such fundamental matters as what we actually mean by moral life; whether we really honestly wish the spiritually best for our chidren, or only the materially best; why we are really in the world at all."

YOUNG AMERICA

Pug o' the Laurel Bush

BY MARGARET HAYNE

PART II.

THE NEXT morning after the dog show Big Sister rushed down to get the morning paper. "Why, how funny!" she called disappointedly. "Puggy didn't get a prize. And the trophy wasn't awarded to anyone. It says, 'The two pugs entered were so inferior that the cup was withheld.' Why, what do you think!"

"Puggy didn't get the prize!" shouted everyone. "Why, something is wrong!" And they all gathered around, talking at once and blaming the judge and wondering how it could possibly have happened.

When papa went over to the city to his office he learned the whole truth. Since the day before the dog show no trace had been found of Puggy, though they were doing everything they could to find him. And when papa told the family the children were heartbroken.

Puggy was advertised for in every newspaper in the county, and papa sent to the sheriff of Santa Cruz and the county a complete description of Puggy, which the sheriff sent to every household that he knew. Rewards were offered, and the family did everything but scour the country themselves. As Big Sister suggested he might have been stolen and taken to another part of the state, notices were sent out to all the different counties of California about the small pug lost at Santa Cruz.

Time went by and no news came. One day, however, a letter came to papa's office. It was from Santa Cruz, evidently from a foreigner. It read this way: "I can find your dog. A woman has it, she lives around the corner from me in a white house. Everyone says she is crazy and they are afraid of her here. Your dog is only taken out walking after dark. Every night he cries for his home; I can hear him. Send someone down and I will help them find him." It was signed "Mrs. Fischer."

College Brother and Big Sister wrote they would come, and took the early morning train. A pleasant-faced German woman, greatly excited, met them at Santa Cruz.

"I just love dogs," she said, "and I have been so interested in the poor little prize pug that was lost. I know how it feels to lose a pet. This woman lives around the corner from me," she went on in response to Big Sister's and College Brother's eager questions, "all by herself in a great white house. She doesn't seem to know anyone here, and nobody knows where she came from, and the few people she has met she never speaks to. One evening I was going by and I heard a dog howling. Every evening after that when we strolled out after dinner we would hear this pitiful noise which came from the house. Two nights ago I went by and saw the woman in the garden patting a little pug. When it saw me it ran down to the gate, wagging its tail and dancing. I stopped to look at him, and there was the same dog you had advertised for.

"'Why, that's the dog!' I exclaimed.

"She glared at me. 'What do you mean?' she cried, and went on into the house, calling Puggy after her.

"'It's the dog all Santa Cruz has been looking for. Look in the newspapers.'

"'Mind you own business,' she said; and picking up the dog, she disappeared in the house. Just before she closed the door she put her head out and called, 'That's my dog, and you're not going to get him, or all Santa Cruz, either.'"

A ten-minute walk brought them to the white house. Then Mrs. Fischer took her stand at the gate while Big Sister and College Brother went up and knocked at the door. A little dark-faced woman with mournful black eyes opened the door and eyed them suspiciously. Big Sister assumed a businesslike air.

"We have come to see you on a matter of importance, madam," she said.

They were shown into a dark, close room with drawn shutters. Out of the gloom peered stiff family portraits. The woman looked at them expectantly. Just then a scuffling was heard in the hall and a scratching at the door, and a little dog rushed in, whining and breathless, and jumped on Big Sister's lap. He cried, he licked her cheek, he danced. Then he ran over to Big Brother. It was Pug o' the Laurel Bush.

"I think, madam, that this is sufficient to tell you what our business is. Good day," and they carried Puggy away, tucked under Big Sister's arm, and were out in the road before the woman could say a single word.

They were so happy and Puggy was so wild with joy at seeing them that they decided to go down to the beach for the afternoon and take the evening train for home. Just as they were going up from the beach they met the little dark-eyed woman. She came up to them with tears in her eyes.

"Please," she said, "please forgive me. I know you think I am a thief. I was out in my garden one evening, when I heard a dog's cry out on the road, and the chug-chug of a motorcycle speeding away. I went out and found Puggy lying in the road, just where the motorcycle had knocked him. I took him in and cared for him, and for days I didn't know whether he would live or die. Then I grew so fond of him I felt I just couldn't give him up. I've had a hard life," she went on. "I won't tell you about it, but that little animal made me think, for the first time in years, of someone besides myself. And I saw the advertisement and just said I wouldn't give him up, I grew so fond of him. Please forgive me! I just—just couldn't help it," and she held out her hand.

Big Brother and Big Sister looked at her. She was little and old and she was very unhappy. So they shook hands and left her waving good-by to them as they disappeared from her sight, carrying the much loved Puggy in their arms.

Then came the night ride out of Santa Cruz and the joyful homecoming. And when Pug o' the Laurel Bush found he was really home at last he flew round and round from room to room, upstairs and downstairs; and Tom Lamb flew after him, making wild snatches at his curly tail. And then when they had calmed down a little, and had hugged Puggy to their hearts' content, and he had had a wonderful dinner, with all sorts of goodies, they gathered around the fire, for the weather, with the changeableness that California weather has, had turned chilly again; and Tom Lamb sat down next to Puggy and patted him gravely now and then. So Puggy's troubles were finally over, and the family and its "dear animals" were happy once more.

Pug o' the Laurel Bush never was a show dog again, as the family decided the risk of losing him was too great. But two days after his return a beautiful silver trophy came to him from the dog show judge at Santa Cruz. "For Pug o' the Laurel Bush, who hated to be a prize dog and ran away! From Santa Cruz, 1912."

And there it stands on the mantelpiece in the dining room, the last and loveliest of Puggy's cups.

Riddles You May Not Know

Some day when your boy and girl friends come to see you, and it's too warm to run and romp, try a game of riddles. Here are a few "fish" riddles which they may not know:

What fish is found in every band? Drum.

What fish is served with meats? Jelly.

What fish is worn by officers in the army? Sword.

What fish is a household pet? Cat.

What fish forms a resting place for birds? Perch.

What fish represents the earth? Globe.

What fish is not on the earth? Moon.

What fish is found among royalty? King.

What fish guides the ships? Pilot.

What fish was once used as a military weapon? Pike.

What fish is a destroyer of ships? Torpedo.

What fish is a carpenter's tool? Saw.

What fish is prominent in winter sports? Skate.

Five Things to Hide

If you your ears would save from jeers
Five things keep meekly hid:
"Myself" and "I" and "mine" and "my,"
And what "I do and did."

MOTHER'S CURE

By Pauline Frances Camp

I have a little sister. She
Is two; I'm five years old.
Sometimes she spoils my nicest things,
Though not to she is told.
And then I get real cross at her,
And slap her hands and scold!

But mother looks so sorry, and
She says, "Eliz'beth Ann,
Go put your arms around her, dear,
And love her all you can.
She's only two years old, you know,
And doesn't understan'."

At first I hate to do it, and
I hide my face and grieve.
I'd like to run away and sulk,
If mother'd give me leave!
And though I may look loving, it
Is only make-believe.

But when I feel against my arm
Her little curly head;
And see the little shiny tear
Upon her cheek so red;
And think she might be sister to
Some other girl instead—

The crossness goes right straight away,
And I just hug her tight.
And side by side we squeeze up close,
And love with all our might.
And mother smiles upon us both,
And everything looks bright!

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

August 3, 1913—The Plagues of Egypt

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Psalms 105:23-36. Golden Text, Matthew 23:12: Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be humbled; and whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted.

This lesson is a record of the miraculous. Miracles and reason are close friends. One does not contradict the other. Concede God and the rest follows. The constancy of what we call law forms no insuperable barrier. Law as we see it is the will of God manifesting itself in nature. The one law with which we are most familiar is that of gravitation, but in its final analysis gravitation is no better understood than the ten plagues of Egypt. The more one knows of nature the more inclined he should be to accept the supernatural. God has had recourse to the miraculous at the rarest intervals, and then only in exigencies beyond the natural order.

Pharaoh Is Given His Chance, but Refuses to Listen

Pharaoh was first entreated to let the people go. But he insulted God and sent the people back to their tasks with redoubled vigor. His action was an attack not so much upon the Israelites as upon God himself. For centuries God's promise that their bondage should not be forever had lain upon the heart of Israel. The time of their deliverance had come, and the Almighty must be true to himself. Hence the need that demanded the interposition of the supernatural. God always approaches the sinner in his more merciful aspect. He warns the prodigal that his course will lead to ruin. Ten thousand have gone that way before and all with the same result. But the young man refuses to listen. Pharaoh is also given his chance, and with the same result. There is nothing to awaken the slightest fear. The road is pleasant and flowers bloom on either side. But the plagues await him. This is the experience of daily life.

The plagues were an attack upon the theology of the country quite as much as upon the king himself. The Egyptians worshiped the Nile. Where it came from no one knew. To them it was the giver and sustainer of life. There is an old Egyptian hymn which the natives sang to the river: "Hail thou, O Nile, that showest thyself in this land, coming in peace and giving life to Egypt. O concealed One, thou leadest the night onward to the day, a leading that rejoices the heart, giving life to every home." This was the god first to be smitten by the rod of Moses.

Gods of Pharaoh Smitten in the First Plague

It is a significant fact that the first plague was visited upon the river. "Get thee unto Pharaoh in the morning; lo! he goeth out into the water," was the command of God. It is more than possible that the king was on his way to worship, or possibly to attend some festivity of a god. Such occasions were not unusual on the banks of the Nile. But whatever the nature of his mission, Pharaoh would be surrounded by a vast retinue of attendants when Moses and Aaron came upon the scene. Their appearance must have been highly dramatic. Both were over 80 years of age, and yet in the fullness of their strength. Pharaoh knew them. He had met them before in an interview not likely to be forgotten. The two stood side by side, one with the magic rod in his hand. And Moses, fastening his eyes upon the king, thus addressed him: "Jehovah, the God of the Hebrews, hath sent me unto thee, saying, Let my people go, that they may serve me in the wilderness; and behold, hitherto thou hast not hearkened. Thus saith Jehovah, In this thou shalt know that I am Jehovah: behold, I will smite with the rod that is in my hand upon the waters which are in the river, and they shall be turned to blood. And the fish that are in the river shall die." Then Aaron, taking the rod from the hand of Moses, smote the water in the sight of Pharaoh and in the sight of his servants, and the waters were turned into blood and the fish died, according to the word of God.

The effect upon Pharaoh must have been startling. His gods were smitten by a single blow. Not only were the waters sacred but many of the fish were ranked among the divinities. This should have been sufficient to touch his heart, but he only turned and went into his house, even more determined not to let the people go.

Plague after plague followed in rapid succession. The magicians were appealed to and at first seem to have been successful. But imitations are self-destructive. The magicians could imitate, and that was all. They could make water look like blood, but they could not turn blood back to water. Such is a false gospel. It is easier to disturb than it is to quiet.

The third plague came without warning, thus giving the magicians no time for preparation. The result was that they withdrew from the rivalry and confessed that this was the "finger of God." The plague upon the cattle, like that upon the river, was an attack on the god system of the country. The god of Egypt was Apis, or the sacred bull, supposed to be the incarnation of Osiris, worshiped as the god of the underworld in Egyptian mythology. His temple was at Memphis. Once a year when the Nile began to rise a golden cup was thrown into the river and a grand festival was held in his honor. It is quite possible that a sacred bull was among the beasts touched by the plague.

Pharaoh Fears Darkness, but Is Not Drawn Toward Light

As Moses approached the end of the trial a horror of great darkness settled down upon the country, but the "children of Israel had light in their dwellings." This plague also came without warning. It differs from the others in that it seems to have been more supernatural. Objects from nature, such as the river, frogs and locusts, appear to have formed no part of it. Pharaoh was partially persuaded. He was willing that the people should go, but their flocks must be left behind. To this Moses objected. The cattle were essential for sacrifice. Like a true servant of God, wherever he went he took his religion with him. But the king was unchanged. Fear is never conversion. He feared the darkness, but was not drawn toward the light where the Israelites were. Again Pharaoh's heart was hardened, not of God but of himself. Affliction either makes or unmakes men. It leaves one better or worse. Pharaoh it left worse, as it has left many a man since.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—Afflictions which soften saints harden sinners. Fortune is never secure by natural sequence, but only by the blessing of God. The man who answers the divine call is fortified by divine providences. Jehovah is a God above all gods.

"Psalm 105 puts in song the story of God's mighty deliverance as told in Exodus, that it may be sung with voice and instrument, stir the heart with its depth of feeling and end as does the psalm with 'Praise ye the Lord.' Exodus is didactic, instructive; the psalm fills the story with enthusiasm and inspires heart and life.

"Exodus is the pure water of life; the psalm is that water changed into steam, a motive power."—Peloubet.

The study of a sinner's resistance to so-called corrective influence is a mournful one, but one which gives little support to the theory of redemption by purgatorial penalties. A stubborn child is unfortunately no product of the imagination. Despite correction a sinner remains a sinner until brought by grace, not by suffering, to confess his fault. If "a penalty is only to be justified when it accomplishes reform," it is seldom justified. Plagues have in themselves no converting power, neither have purgatorial fires any redeeming grace. Pharaoh was an object lesson on the impotence of pain for effecting a change of heart. It "hardened his heart," as it has that of millions of convicts since. The first offender may be warned by it, but the old offender is sure to return for yet further punishment.

The Refuge Becomes a Prison; the Slave a Menace

Verses 23-4—History is full of these reversals of fortune. The family of Jacob had found a harbor of refuge in the land of the Nile. It seemed a blessed home to them after the drought had starved them out of Palestine. They thought all their troubles over when the rich pastures of the district of Goshen were assigned them as a residence. Unfortunately such security and wealth began to tell upon their moral fiber, just as later the prosperity of certain families in Babylon rendered them unwilling to accompany the more patriotic and devout back to Jerusalem (Ezra 7:6-7).

But every subject race becomes a terror to the dominant race by its more rapid multiplication. The Helots in Greece, the Janizaries among the Turks and the negroes in our states and the West Indies are historic examples.

Verse 25—Where godliness has rendered slavery nominal, its evil possibilities are not recognized. The employer of free labor may make his service a hell to those dependent upon him for wages. But any relation between capital and labor which is not sanctified by conscience and kindness becomes a font of hate. Legislation may ameliorate either evil, but nothing except the grace of God can make it sweet. The more a master abuses a slave, the more an employer defrauds an employee, the more the man in power hates—and eventually fears—the laborer. And the hate of the overlord is returned by the slave with increased intensity. A servile war is the natural outcome of a servile state.

Man of God Attested by the Sign of God

Verse 26—The hour struck and the man appeared. Moses impresses himself upon every reader of history with almost equal force. Great scholars ponder his career with awe. Artists strive to put some of his dominant characteristics into ideal forms. He was equally great as a soldier, statesman or religious reformer. Surrounded by hostile tribes born to war, his army, composed of former slaves born to bitter toil, was never defeated. Brought up in the palace of an autocrat, he founded the first great commonwealth. And learned in all the idolatries of the Egyptian priesthood, he established a monotheism which in its essential elements is the dominant religion of the world today.

Verse 27—Pharaoh knew his own power and he would only submit to a greater. If anything could shake his bulldog tenacity it would have to be the exhibition of a power greater than his own, with "signs" of a supernatural origin behind it. And even the signs that were given only loosened his grip; they did not wholly relax it.

Contest Not Simply One of Men, But of Gods

Verse 29—The plague mentioned in verse 28 is there introduced out of its order as given in Exodus (ch. 10:22). The first of these "signs" was directed against the Nile (Ex. 7:17), the one great natural resource upon which the whole empire rested, and which, in deified image, Egypt worshiped.

Verse 30—The second plague had to do with their frog-headed god Ptah, who was now shown to be unable to protect them, but whose slimy representatives covered the land with a loathsome burden. Then followed the plague of insects (v. 31) whose exact nature is not certain because the old names have lost their original meanings. But the creatures referred to were doubtless animal parasites which in great number make life unendurable. Then came the electric storms (v. 32) not unlike our tornadoes (Ex. 9:23-24) and the wide destruction of crops (v. 33), quickly succeeded by pests which ate down to the roots every green thing. The next affliction was a "thick darkness" (v. 28; Ex. 10:21-23). The last plague was the decimation of the households by a black death which cut off the hope and joy and strength of each family in the loss of its first-born male. We speak of such a series of disasters as "unparalleled," forgetting that every war between great states, arising from personal ambitions and fomented by race hatreds, brings upon the earth sufferings beside which all these were insignificant and only worthy of record as signs. Man's deepest wounds are all self-inflicted.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning July 27, 1913

Topic—The Pharisee and the publican. Luke 18:10-14.

This parable was spoken not simply in reference to the Pharisees, or against them; it was spoken to them. Jesus would set one of their number directly in their view, under a strong light, that they might see themselves as God himself saw them, under the light of eternity. This discourse held equally true of all who had the disposition of the Pharisees.

The men addressed trusted in themselves. They set a high valuation on themselves. They regarded themselves as righteous; and they believed that their righteousness could sustain any trial, before any court of justice, not excluding the judgment seat of God. In their lives there was nothing blameworthy, nothing morally imperfect. Such was their estimate of themselves; but of the rest of mankind they held a very different opinion.

The "others" (literally, "the rest") were those who did not belong to their sect. It was a religious class-consciousness that was thus expressed. It was impossible that each individual man should have thought that he was the only righteous person. He did think that he belonged to the only righteous class, the only social group possessing moral worthiness.

Both men went up to the temple with the purpose of praying. But there was no spiritual fellowship between these two worshipers. The temple, which was intended to serve the purpose of unifying Israel in the worship of the one true God, becomes itself the source of disunion; and these two men stand far apart. The Pharisee is, according to the accepted view of his age, the personification not only of the religious sanctity of Israel, but also of her national integrity. On the other hand, the publican is the embodiment of carelessness concerning religious duties, of the oppression of the heathen tyrant, and of all moral corruption. He belongs to the scum of the national life.

The Pharisee stood and prayed to himself. Such prayers as his were never too distinctly articulated, for other men did not like them. And there is nothing said about his bowing his head before beginning to pray, as is subsequently stated in the case of the publican. The Pharisee, who was habitually clean and ready for prayer, had no need of showing signs of humility before God, but simply stood up in a conspicuous place and began his devotions. He gave thanks that he was lifted above other men, lifted above the ordinary levels of frail morality.

The matters he selected for his grounds of self-praise were nothing extraordinary. He was not an extortioner (eighth commandment), not an adulterer (seventh commandment), not unjust, especially in reference to his neighbor's property (an attenuated view of the tenth commandment). They were only the grossest forms of the transgressions of the commandments which he mentioned, and from which he knew himself to be free. His great error was that he believed all other men to be guilty of these crimes. This constituted the whole of the negative side of his ideal.

But was his ideal higher on the positive side? In his mind it was evidently splendid. He fasted twice in the week! According to the Mosaic law (Lev. 19:29-31) he was obligated to fast once in the year, on the great day of atonement. Other fasts were afterwards added. But this Pharisee fasted 100 times as often as the ancient law required. His fast days were Mondays and Thursdays. He thought that he showed the same zeal in the paying of tithes. Tithes were due for the larger kinds of produce, the seed of the land, the fruit of the tree and the offspring of herd and flock (Lev. 27:30-32), but the Pharisee tithed everything, even to the mint and anise and cummin (Matt. 23:23).

The Pharisee showed gratification for his advantages over others, self-complacency, confidence of obtaining a reward that would be withheld from others, glad assurance that the corruption that would overtake other men would be changed to blessedness for himself. Because he was already righteous beyond any need of additional righteousness, he was utterly inaccessible to moral idealism.

The publican's prayer was a humble cry for aid, the expression of a profound personal need. His life had been wicked, and he knew it. He was bowed beneath the load of guilt and shame. He had nothing to offer God except a broken and contrite heart.

He stood afar off from the company of regular worshipers. However much a publican might desire to draw near to God, it was contrary to human nature that he should try to come near to a Pharisee. The reason was partly his own sense of unworthiness, partly his anger at the unfairness of the Pharisee, and partly a general feeling of shame that prompted him to hide himself anywhere in the presence of too great respectability. That he did not lift up his eyes to heaven was, according to Jewish custom, a token of his sense of sin. The beating of his breast denoted his pain of penitence. Out of his inward anguish was pressed the cry, "God, be thou merciful to me a sinner."

The publican went down to his house justified; that is to say, his sins were forgiven him. The Pharisee's sins were not forgiven. And in this exquisite parable Jesus has declared to his disciples the meaning of those strange words spoken at the opening of his ministry: "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:20).

Jesus has antiquated the lifeless system of the Pharisees. Religion is deeper than rules, it is the devotion of the heart. Indeed, an excessive attention to rules will bind the soul and prevent its upward movement. The Pharisee would approach God almost as though he were prepared to do business with him upon equal terms. Therefore does his piety contain no saving grace. It is nothing but self-deception. But on the other hand, because the publican has been brought low by the knowledge of his own wickedness, and his hopelessness of ever being able to attain a righteousness through an external correctness of conduct, he has been drawn to the side of the God of forgiveness. He stands in a right relation to God. He can be made better.

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

August 3, 1913

"IT'S DOGGED AS DOES IT"

Topic—The ideal Christian. VIII. His perseverance. Hebrews 6:10-20.

More things are wrought by sheer sticking to it than by brilliant flashes of genius. Need of the old English proverb, "It's dogged as does it," has never been outgrown. The men who have succeeded with any great task, whether it be Cyrus Field laying the Atlantic cable or the Wright brothers conquering the air, are those who have persevered, and persevered, and persevered. The same law operates in the realm of character. Everybody has impulses to holiness, and most persons know hours of high vision and resolution, when they determine to dwell on the heights. But noble lives do not come by occasional inspirations. A steady, resolute, unshakable persistence, through all changes of temperamental weather, in holy thought and Christlike deeds—that is what makes the saintly character. In the government of life emotion may be the legislative branch, but the will's quality of perseverance is the executive branch.

Almost anybody can run twenty-five yards; nobody but the trained can run twenty-five miles. It is easy to start; it shows greatness to continue.

When I am dead,
May this with truth be said,
On the rude stone that marks my lowly head,
That, spite of doubt and indecision,
In spite of weakness, lameness, blindness,
Heart's treachery and fate's unkindness,
Neglect of friends and scorn of foes,
Stark poverty and all its woes,
The body's ills that cloud the mind
And the bold spirit bind,
Still through my earthly course I went,
Not disobedient
Unto the heavenly Vision.
—Harry Koopman.

Sometimes there comes to men concerned for the welfare of the world and the glory of God a vision. It is not such a vision of an opened heaven as greeted John's enraptured eyes. Nor is it the glory that was revealed to Ezekiel. This is but a vision of a company of Christians who have vowed a vow to stand fast by the work of the kingdom. Their intellectual and social qualities are a matter of indifference. The one condition of membership in this company is that each shall make a pledge in his heart never to let go the Christian work he has chosen until it has been accomplished, or until he has been called to give account of his stewardship to the Master in person. Discouragement cannot loose such a servant's hold of his task, nor can criticism affright him. Others may grow weary in well doing, but for himself, he perseveres to the end. In such a company one sees hope for the accomplishment of the great tasks which confront the church today. Like David's soldiers who adventured to the well of Bethlehem, devoted followers of this sort can accomplish literally anything for the kingdom. All tasks are possible to them. They would become the church's arm of conquest, like Cæsar's tenth legion. And for this service each volunteer may enroll by an act of consecration in his heart.

A New York journalist once told me of a conversation he had with a leading brewer on the subject of reform in politics. Said the brewer: "We know the church people can beat us any time they choose, and when we see that they are really aroused, we have to bow to the storm. But they soon grow tired, and then we can come back. They have the power, but we have the perseverance, and that is why we are usually on top."

There is the flavor of real greatness about this virtue of perseverance. Its disdain of opposition, discouragement and the deadly drag of monotony rises to the proportions of genius. A small-minded person is scarcely capable of saying, with Paul, "This one thing I do"—and then of going right on doing it to the end.

"The virtue of the postage stamp, my son, is that it sticks to one thing until it gets there."

The long patience of God, the immense stretches of his plans, the persistence of his designs through centuries and millenniums, is a lofty argument for perseverance on the part of all who would be sharers in his work.

"God is working his purpose out,
As year succeeds to year;
God is working his purpose out,
And the time is drawing near—
Nearer and nearer draws the time,
The time that shall surely be,
When the earth shall be filled with the glory of God,
As the waters cover the sea."

It is a conquest when we can lift ourselves above the annoyances of circumstances over which we have no control; but it is a greater victory when we can make those circumstances our helpers—when we can appreciate the good that is in them.—Lucy Larcom.

There is no intellectual aristocracy for Christians. The impulse of the new life does its work upon peasant and noble alike. Christian education is the great promoter and maintainer of democracy.

MISSIONARY WORK

Christian Service in a War God's Temple

The station at Nanhsuchow, Anhwei, China, has been open but a little over a year, and there are but few foreigners in the town. But when the request for a day of prayer for China was issued, the missionaries set about following out the suggestion. Owing to some previously formed plans, the station decided to arrange special prayer in connection with the regular services without formally inviting officials or others than the regular attendants. But before this proposition could be carried out the city magistrate called and asked that a prayer service be conducted for all the people in the town. The school was too small for such a public service, and inasmuch as it was at the request of the city magistrates, the missionaries decided it would be all right to use the temple of the god of war. The building was crowded to its doors with a quiet and attentive audience, though counting the missionaries and helpers, there were less than a dozen confessed Christians in the whole body. There were about 200 people in the building, and nearly half as many standing in the large open door.

The Buddhist priests were invited by both the officials and missionaries to attend the services, and they were present. The Catholic priest in the village was also invited, and responded that he would gladly come, but that he was afraid his superiors would not countenance his worshiping with Protestants. It is worthy of note that the city magistrate did not call upon the Catholics, who have been established in Nanhsuchow for many years, to hold this service of prayer, but upon the newly arrived Protestants.

Students at Nanking University Celebrating the Recognition of the Chinese Republic by the United States

As a center of republicanism Nanking was, of course, the scene of great rejoicing when news came of America's recognition. Students from all the schools in the city gathered at the university and marched to the American consulate. Each student carried both an American and a Chinese flag and the songs and yells would have done credit to the vocal powers of any western group of college men. President A. J. Bowen of the university is coming to America to look after the institution's interests in this country. Vice-President John E. Williams, whose labors have been remarkably successful, will sail from Vancouver Aug. 13 on his return.

Age of Child Wives in India Rising

Although not in connection with the missionary enterprise in India, Miss Tennant, an American, goes about the country as traveling secretary of the Hindu Marriage Reform League. In a speech at Calcutta Miss Tennant is reported to have said that in Bengal the marriageable age of girls is rising gradually and is now generally between 13 and 14, but that in some provinces girls are betrothed at the age of 6, 7 and 8, and are mothers at 12 and 13. Miss Tennant said that she knew of one girl of 13 with a 6-month-old baby and had seen a girl of 18 who was the mother of six children. In 1901 there were 6,000,000 child wives between the ages of 10 and 15, but in 1911 the total had increased by a half million. There are, according to this last census, 2,500,000 child wives between the ages of 5 and 10. The awful condition of girl widowhood is well known and it is worth remembering that there are 94,000 of these widows between the ages of 5 and 10.

Busy at Silliman Institute, Dumaguette

Situated in the most central port of the southern islands, this college is the only one in the Philippines where the Bible is a textbook. In its twelfth year there have been 613 students enrolled and 200 turned away for lack of room. Seventy-two students confessed their faith in Christ last year. Fifty, on an average, go out each Sunday afternoon during the school year to hold services in the near-by towns, or street meetings. The students represent twenty-four provinces. Practically all of the work at the institute is performed by them. Industrial training began with the acquirement of a printing press, and each year there are turned out a million pages of printed matter from two presses. In the hospital all that apply are cared for, without regard for race or religion. From 1,200 to 1,800 treatments are given monthly.

Missionary Brevities

—A Y. M. C. A. has just been launched in Paotingfu. It has had a most auspicious beginning, with some twenty-four charter members. It has a fine opportunity before it, for there are many students in the town who need some such helping hand.

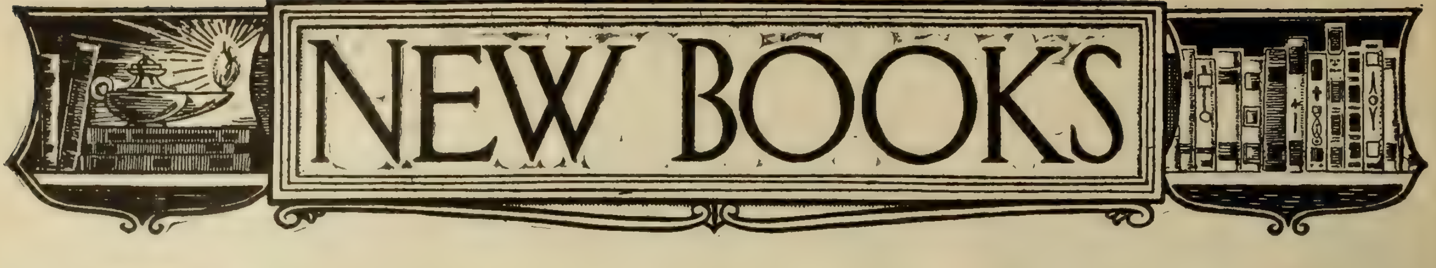
—The Kenneth McKenzie School for Boys in Lakawn, Laos, was awarded prizes for excellence in leather work at the exhibition of arts and crafts held in Bangkok Jan. 3 to 5. This award of prizes is noteworthy because they were the only prizes secured by any school outside the city of Bangkok. Rev. H. S. Vincent is the principal, and it was he who introduced leather tanning and shoemaking there.

—The home mission school which has been lately established by Rev. and Mrs. John Knox Coit in the Nacoochee valley in northern Georgia has recently enjoyed a powerful revival, in which a number of the most promising mountain boys and girls in the school, as well as several of their parents from the surrounding country, have been converted. Every student in the boarding department who had not previously done so confessed Christ before the meetings ended. The preaching was by Rev. J. A. Bryan of Birmingham, Ala.

Board Notes and Announcements

—Perhaps nothing is a pleasanter reminder of the promise, "The desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose," than such stories as Miss Morrow of Etah, Miss Pratt of Ambala, Miss Given and Miss Downs of Hoshyarpur, India; Miss Hunting of Syria and other long experienced teachers tell of the homes they find when going to visit their old scholars. Miss Julia Leavitt of Japan, missionary of Indiana Presbyterial Society, in company with Miss Morgan of the Wilmina Girls' School, Osaka, was recently in Korea. In the course of their visit they were guests in the homes of some of the alumnæ of the Osaka school in various cities and were entertained "with lavish hospitality." One lady had decorated a room with artificial flowers and strands of gayly colored paper. "Knowing that they would be feeling the bareness of Korea," she thought she "must have something to take the place of Japan's abundant flowers."

—The Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest was led by Mrs. James M. Gray of Moody Bible Institute. Reading a letter from Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Booth of Chefoo, in which was mention of Dr. M. D. Hardin's lecture on the empress dowager, Mrs. Berry said, "That lecture was to me a revelation." The leader told how the words of Mrs. Howard Taylor of China, when she was her guest in Boston, turned the heart of a kingly giver who had cared nothing for foreign missions. Mrs. Clow read letters from Mrs. Stead and Miss Sutherland of Persia and gave good news from Mrs. E. T. Allen of Urumia. Other letters read were from Taikú and Chungju, Korea, that from Miss Martha Switzer of Taiku bringing a request for picture cards, for use in the large Sunday school lately opened there for non-Christians, and in her country Bible classes, where they are much prized as certificates of attendance. Recent callers in Room 48 were Dr. W. A. Briggs of the Laos mission, Siam, and his sons Albert and Wilson, eager to reach Vancouver to rejoin their mother, whom they had not seen since her last furlough.



A Summary of Summer Fiction

For Serious Readers

Ashes and Sparks, by Percy White, portrays suffragism in England through the life story of a very handsome and attractive young woman of good family who was exposed to the danger of advanced education at an English woman's college. From that experience she evolved her independence, going her own way regardless of family opinions. Into the suffrage cause she flung herself, making speeches in parks and public places and finally overwhelming her family by "marrying" another person of advanced ideas who already had a wife in the insane asylum. The novel moves along with a moderate amount of sparkle and insight. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

The Wooing of Margaret Trevenna, by Roy Meldrum, contains a deal of dashing romance, with some fine underlying emotions. It is a story of seventeenth-century England, with the Puritan-Royalist conflict enlivening the love of Margaret Trevenna and Dick Broughton, and bringing excitement to their exceedingly happy life, until the end is reached for Margaret. Out of life's turmoil she goes, leaving to her husband and her little daughter a beautiful memory, with which the book closes. It is a nice bit of fiction, ending rather unexpectedly but wholesomely. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Southerner, by Thomas Dixon. Mr. Dixon has painted a vivid and moving picture of Abraham Lincoln. It is a portrayal of the real Lincoln, beset on every side by hostile forces, misunderstood and misjudged. The story is forceful and dramatic, its tragic intensity being lightened by dexterous touches of humor. The love interest is well sustained, the climax being reached in one of the many attempts to assassinate the President. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Vanishing Points, by Alice Brown. A collection of stories of the highest order—just the kind of stories Miss Brown knows how to write. "The Man in the Cloister" is unusual, striking and provocative; "Mother" is a beautiful thing that every mother with a grown son should read; "The Interpreter," "The Wizard's Touch," "A Man of Feeling" and "The Hands of the Faithful" are also notable. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Veiled Women, by Marmaduke Pickthall, is an unfortunate attempt to make clear the position of Oriental women. The accomplishment is reached through the experiences of an English governess, who adopts Islamism and marries an Egyptian bey, entering the harem life, which is described with rather nauseating detail. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Crossriggs, by Mary and Jane Findlater. The Findlater sisters are justly celebrated for their famous Scotch characters, and their new book is as diverting as usual, fairly bristling with humor and insight. The dialect never becomes too "broad" for enjoyment. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

The Isle of Life, by Stephen French Whitman, is a colorful, dramatic tale of modern Rome and Sicily centering about a woman's struggle between the allurements of civilization and the vitality of a primitive life, with love as its big idea. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Quarry, by John A. Moroso. An innocent boy, coming to New York for the first time, is convicted of murder and sentenced to Sing Sing for life. How a romance grows out of this grim situation is worth reading about. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

The House of Thane, by Elizabeth Dejeans, preaches against false pride in rather obnoxious fashion. It is an ugly story of a self-centered business man whose great ideal is to establish a family, to give his name stable recognition. To that end he marries a beautiful woman who does not love him, merely using his money to gratify her social ambitions. In time a son is born, and though the man and his wife are absolutely estranged, both care greatly for the child. John Thane's house of cards falls about his ears, however, when he discoveres that the child is not his son, and that the girl who has been his mistress for many years cannot live. There is some interesting character work, particularly in regard to the girl, but it is not a wholesome or a beneficial book. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.25.

A Muslim Sir Galahad, by Henry Otis Dwight, is a story of the life of the Kurds and the struggle of a boy who, refusing to conform to the religious practices of his ancestors, seeks something better for himself. The account of his troubles with family and school authorities makes interesting reading. As a supplemental book for mission classes studying the faith of Islam it is splendid. There are sidelights on the life of these people which could come only from the rich experience of a missionary such as Dr. Dwight, who has been among the Mohammedans for thirty years. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.

The Right of the Strongest, by Frances Nimmo Greene, takes the reader straight into the Alabama mountains, where is fought again the old fight between progress and conservatism. An American business man attempts to acquire the lands of the mountaineers, and they cling to their few acres with a blind hatred of the interloper. Both types of people are well introduced, and there is good atmosphere, stirring incident and a fine type of heroine. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Daughter of a Rebel, by G. Vere Tyler, is the story of a southern girl dissatisfied with herself and out of sympathy with her surroundings, who leaves her native town and comes to New York to make her fortune. Her experiences there, her return and acceptance of her former life constitute the plot. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1.25.

The Hippodrome, by Rachel Hayward. While writing this dramatic tale of Barcelona Miss Hayward actually lived in an anarchist colony in northern France, in order to get her material at first hand. The characters are a band of terrorists and a circus girl who sacrifices her life for her lover's. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Strange Stories from the Lodge of Leisures, translated from the Chinese by George Soulie. An interesting collection of eighteenth century stories representative of the lighter reading indulged in by the Chinese of the old empire. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Long Engagement, by E. S. Stevens. "Are long engagements wise things?" This is the question Miss Stevens answers in a novel full of incident built around the love affairs of several couples. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Michael, by Mrs. Henry de la Pasture, gives a picture of aristocratic Roman Catholic society in England and is written with the assurance and artistry always characteristic of Lady Clifford. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Unpathed Waters, by Frank Harris. Nine short stories, some of which exhibit Mr. Harris's particular talent at its best. [Mitchell Kennerley, New York. $1.25 net.

John Cave and Barbara Gwynne: Life, by W. B. Trites. Mr. Trites is the young Englishman who has been winning such extraordinary praise for his first two novels, "John Cave" and "Barbara Gwynne." The first traces the career of a one-time dissolute young newspaper man; the second that of a magnetic young woman who begins life as a shop girl. They are both written with great cleverness, with a quality that seems to reflect life quite fearlessly and frankly, recognizing gayly that "things are as they are." The stories are not suitable for impressionable and undiscriminating young people. [Duffield and Company, New York. Each $1.25 net.

The Fifth Trumpet, by Paul Bertram, glimpses very vividly Germany in the days before the reformation. It has to do chiefly with the shortcomings of Catholicism, particularly as manifested by the moral relations of the priests; and it pictures a grim state of affairs in which no home was safe, for against the church one dared not protest, no matter what outrage was offered to his women folks. It is a stirring romance containing a great many very unpleasant incidents, which probably were typical of a very unpleasant period in history. [John Lane Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Hero of Herat, by Maud Diver, endeavors to dress history in the cloak of romance by taking for its hero Eldred Pottinger, one of India's many brave but forgotten soldiers, and recounting his life, keeping as close to facts as is possible. It is a good idea, and the author has chosen a good subject; yet she scarcely carries her point and we feel a trifle dissatisfied with the book as a romance, yet not quite convinced by it as a history. It is all very carefully and conscientiously done and to some it may carry the desired appreciation. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

The Catfish, by Charles Marriott. Beginning with boyhood Mr. Marriott traces his hero's life through many interesting phases, the most absorbing of which center about the two women he loves. Written with subtlety and power. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.35 net.

Hagar Revelly, by Daniel Carson Goodman. Of all the recent books dealing distastefully with the sex question "Hagar Revelly" is outstanding in indelicacy. The frankness of its detail is too revolting to admit of a critical review. [Mitchell Kennerley, New York. $1.35 net.

The Ambition of Mark Truitt, by Henry Russell Miller. The author of "The Man Higher Up" has written another story of the same type, centering about a man and woman who raise their lives from the depths to the all-conquering heights. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.35 net.

The Impeachment of President Israels. by Frank B. Copley. A striking piece of work and an eloquent plea for universal peace. The plot hinges upon the activities of an imaginary future President of the United States. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1 net.

The Creeping Tides, by Kate Jordan. A strong, swift-moving tale of a woman who has been unjustly sent to jail and a man who has been unjustly court-martialed. It is dedicated to John Masefield. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.30 net.

Sunia, a Himalayan Idyll, by Maud Diver A collection of short stories of India, all excellently done, full of intense life, stirring emotion, and picturesque with the strangeness and beauty of the East. [G. P. Putnam's Sons New York. $1.25 net.

The Kingdom, by Harold Elsdale Goad. The setting is Italy and the action has to do with a man's renunciation of the girl he loves and his subsequent life in a monastery at Assisi. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.25 net.

For the Hammock Reader

Patchwork Comedy, by Humfrey Jordan, possesses a delightfully significant title, for it is the story of lives made up of tragedy and comedy, as lives mostly are, with real courage conquering the worst difficulties. It centers about a promising sculptor, a splendid girl and a young English explorer, and their solution of their problems is sanely and cheerfully arrived at, yet is full of the poignant sting of real experience that goes home keenly. It is a good story, not quite so clever or inspiriting as the author's preceding book, "The Joyous Wayfarer," but it is as well done and very satisfying with its nice character delineation and its shrewd philosophical observations. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.30 net.

Who Laughs Last, by Ashton Hilliers, describes in thoroughly interesting fashion the story of a fellow who comes out on top after all. Things go rather blackly for him at first when his jealous stepbrother influences his father to inflict a very severe punishment upon him for a thoughtless offense—signing his father's name to a check to help a friend out of a hole—but at every turn he shows the stuff of which he is made, and in the end real happiness is restored. There is a nice girl and a love story, too, so the novel is quite complete in addition to being well written. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Declension of Henry D'Albiac, by V. Goldie. A French nobleman and a Scottish suffragist—here's an exciting combination. And their friendship is exciting, for the girl manages to interest the prejudiced nobleman profoundly. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Candid Adventurer, by Anna Coleman Ladd. The vicissitudes of the artistic temperament are entertainingly portrayed in Mrs. Ladd's story of a young painter and his two loves—one a charming New England widow, the other a fascinating Polish girl, his model. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.20 net.

The Silver Dress, by Mrs. George Norman, is an English love story that runs with a proverbial lack of smoothness. There is nothing very vital in the book, but it will afford a pleasant afternoon's reading. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

An Unknown Lover, by Mrs. George de Horne Vaizey. The complications which arise from a brother's and sister's love affairs are cleverly developed amid some exciting adventures by land and sea. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Amiable Crimes of Dirk Memling, by Rupert Hughes. There is nothing commonplace in this detective story. Its hero steals a whole art collection—and then sells it back to its owner. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Windridge, by W. Riley, is an appropriate novel for summer reading, for it deals with a girl who tires of life in London and goes to live in a small village. It has sweetness and freshness. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

General Mallock's Shadow, by W. B. Maxwell, tells of a disgrace attached to a family name and how it was removed. There is also a good love story. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

Parrot & Co., by Harold MacGrath. A transcontinental romance of the typical MacGrath variety, abounding in love and adventure and all the other elements of the best seller. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.30.

The Bugles of Gettysburg, by La Salle Corbett Pickett. A tender romance of the battle by the widow of General George E. Pickett. [F. G. Browne and Company, Chicago. $1 net.

Witching Hill, by E. W. Hornung. The author of "Raffles" writes again of the gentleman criminal. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

Wilsam, by S. C. Nethersole. This is a thoroughly charming story, in a way reflecting the manner of George Eliot, of a child who was taken from a wreck at sea and of her life as she grew up "living out" among relations. She is a quaint little thing, and the characterizations of her aunts and cousins and neighbors, who provided the scant joy and the great hardships of her shadowed young life, are all splendidly done. The story moves quietly, but every page is full of heart interest and the reader follows the development of little Mercy Pardilow's starved childhood into a fine young womanhood with deeply sympathetic interest. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35 net.

"Lo, Michael," by Grace L. H. Lutz, is a pleasant little romance built about dreams and sociology. A brave little newsboy saves the life of a wealthy banker's baby daughter and is sent to college as his reward. When he grows up he hunts up his boyhood pals and runs a little reform institution of his own in the slums. All the time he is loving the girl whom he once saved from death, and after rescuing her from a wretched marriage wins her himself. It is a nice, clean story, unoriginal but pleasing. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.25 net.

The Ware Case, by George Pleydell. A curiously interesting account of a mysterious drowning and the great investigation which followed it. The defendant is an influential criminologist; and his lawyer is in love with his wife. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

A Dream of Blue Roses, by Mrs. Hubert Barclay. A delightfully quaint story infusing an old-world charm into a modern love affair. The heroine is a bewitching "sleeping princess" brought up in an old French town. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Calling the Tune, by Justin Huntley McCarthy. Mr. McCarthy deserts the historical romance and writes about a twentieth century girl and a debonair young man with "pockets full of money and a sense of humor." [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Secret of Lonesome Cove, by Samuel Hopkins Adams, is built around a mystery in the shape of a manacled body which Mr. Adams once discovered beneath the cliffs of Cornwall. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.20 net.

The Ambassadress, by William Wriothesley. The inner life of European diplomatic circles is here reflected with great intimacy by an author who is rumored to be an American. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25.

Patsy, by S. R. Crockett. Patsy is a lively young person who lived in Galloway a hundred years ago during the thrilling time when smugglers flourished. A very well written story. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25.

The Scarlet Rider, by Bertha Runkle. Gay and dashing is this romance of George III.'s reign by the author of "The Helmet of Navarre." The hero is a vagabond—but a lovable one. [Century Company, New York. $1.35.

El Dorado: An Adventure of the Scarlet Pimpernel, by Baroness Orczy. The further dashing adventures of this author's favorite character during the reign of terror. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Guinevere's Lover, by Elinor Glyn, is a piece of sentimental rubbish whose chief claim to censure is that its sensationalism is by no means of the harmless type. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

Adnam's Orchard, by Sarah Grand. Laid in rural England, this long novel tackles in interesting fashion the modern "back-to-the-country" movement. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.40 net.

The Woman of the Twilight, by Mārah Ellis Ryan. A love which defies the conventions and ends in tragedy is the theme of this California romance. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. $1.35 net.

Little Thank You, by Mrs. T. P. O'Connor, combines a delightful child story and a charming love story. The scene is the South. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

American Nobility, by Pierre de Coulevain, is the story of the marriage of an American heiress to a French nobleman. Of course he proves untrue to her; and, of course, his mistress dies; and, of course, he is very sorry; and, of course, his American wife forgives him "because she loves him." We seem to have heard something like this before. The book is amusing in its easy generalizations, especially on "the American woman," but it is written with some of the charm of manner which distinguishes this author. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

The Mind Reader, by Max Rittenberg, relates the astonishing adventures of one Dr Wycherly, a hypnotist and mental healer. [D Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net

Mainly Humorous

The Adventures of Dr. Whitty, by G. A. Birmingham. Dr. Whitty is a quaint Irish physician, a citizen of the little town of Ballintra in Connaught. He is an intense local patriot. and decides that the time is ripe for waking up his native place. On the visit of the chief secretary for Ireland he applies for a public pier to be built at Ballintra. Such a pier would be needless, but, he demands, why not get all you can out of the government? The numerous experiences of this artful diplomat will make everyone laugh. The characters are well drawn and amusing; the adventures are absurd and fiery; yet all the time we are convinced of the possibility of their occurring—in Ireland. Mr. Birmingham, to use his pen name, is being dubbed the Irish Mark Twain. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.20 net.

Courtin' Christina, by J. J. Bell. It is like meeting old friends to open the pages of J. J. Bell's latest Macgreegor story. "Courtin' Christina" is written in the author's happiest vein; his delineation of the youth just reaching adolescence and waking to a consciousness of sex is a joy. Macgreegor with the roughness and independence of sixteen, and his charmers—Jessie, Mary and Christina—form the basis of a charming little tale. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

The Open Hearth

Not Only Reads but Studies The Continent with Good Results

The Presbyterian pastor who is not a paid subscriber to The Continent is guilty of neglect in not taking advantage of one of the greatest sources of self-enrichment offered by any periodical of the Presbyterian or any other church. And I say "paid subscriber" advisedly—a "subscriber," that he might have the paper as his own, and "paid," that he might have part in enlarging its field of service. It is rich in its suggestion of "preacher themes," and great as a starter and quickener of thought currents. I not only read it, but I study it.

But what I started out to say was to particularize on one brief editorial in your issue of June 19. In that number you quote, and make brief comment upon, a sentence from the lips of Dr. Nehemiah Boynton in giving "the charge" to his two sons when they were ordained to the ministry of his church: "My brethren, I gather it all up in one sentence—I charge you to be intimate with the integrities of life. Integrity is the sandal of the sun-treader." Is there anything necessary to be added to make it "all in one sentence"? Can you subtract anything from it, or change one word in it, and yet have "all in one sentence"? Well put, indeed, was your comment: "A tremendous saying. It is good enough for any young man to carry with him all his life as a 'journeyman's card.'"

I declare that when I saw that sentence it brought me up with a jolt. I laid my paper down, but that sentence "would not down." Never have I read, except in the Book, a sentence so striking, commanding, massive, yet succinct and compact. Think of it! "Be intimate with the integrities of life. Integrity is the sandal of the sun-treader." Today I have in my mind, in solution, the germs of three Sunday evening sermons—inoculated by that sentence. God bless Dr. Boynton! God bless his sons! God bless The Continent!

Strong Men as Student Pastors

The editorial "Validating a Once Unvalued Calling" in The Continent of July 3 is a true statement and a fine and deserved appreciation of Dr. Bess and of the great work he is to undertake.

The Continent was one of the first of the church papers to recognize the importance of this new profession of university pastor and to approve the wisdom of the policy adopted by the Board of Education. Your support has helped in establishing this most difficult work on a sound basis.

This editorial omits to state that we have in several of the state universities pastors who are men of first rank who have by their ability, character and achievement brought their new profession to a place of honor. You are correct in stating that the care of students in college and university has been left by the churches to young untried men in temporary employment, but during the last few years our plan of employing only men of experience and special training has lifted the task to a higher plane. I write this because I find that some have misread the editorial and thought you were referring to our other university pastors when you speak of the young men.

RICHARD C. HUGHES.

Where to Draw the Line

I have just had an interview with a young man, who has gone away with a heavy heart and left me with a hot one.

This young man had all the arrangements made for his ordination and installation, a meeting of presbytery had been called, speakers for the occasion had been chosen, the congregation waiting for the formal action of presbytery to give them a pastor to lead them in an important work.

Now, it transpires that the young man cannot produce papers to show that he has taken the course of training required by the Presbyterian standards.

He is a lifelong Presbyterian, he has attended one of our best church colleges and one of our leading seminaries. But he took elective courses in both institutions, omitting some of the important studies. Some of the presbyters refuse to take the responsibility of ordaining him. He has been led to believe that the examination before presbytery is only perfunctory—"a farce" one of his teachers told him—and banking on this he has made this slipshod preparation and is facing a bitter humiliation. Of course he is not without blame for this. But what is to be said of the teachers and guides of his education who have encouraged him in this irregular course?

If a large and influential presbytery will license and ordain men because they are "sweet-spirited" in spite of their lack of faith in fundamental doctrine, why not do the same thing in spite of their ignorance?

The two things that have characterized the Presbyterian ministry for generations, and have given it a reputation that appeals to certain ambitious ones, are its high standard of education, and its loyalty to the word of God. The problem of our colleges and seminaries is growing more and more complex. But here is a question that lies at the very foundation of our church. Where shall we draw the line in presbyterial examinations between a liberal interpretation of our laws, so as to admit the best, and letting down the bars to agnosticism or to laziness? Some of us still think that ordination to the ministry in the Presbyterian Church is too serious a business to be turned into a "farce."

Whatever exceptions are made, short cuts to the ministry that are merely to save time and honest work should be discouraged.

PRESBYTERIAN.

Two Boy Scout Organizations

My attention has been invited to a letter by F. W. Osborn in The Continent under the caption "Boy Scouts and Sunday Observance." It is evident that the writer of this article is in entire sympathy with the Boy Scout movement, but very much concerned with the kind of leadership that would tend to "take the boys from church and Sunday school and increase the difficulties of those who are interested in the religious education of the young." To illustrate this point he refers to a recent assembly of Boy Scouts in one of the Brooklyn armories on a Sunday afternoon and a parade in Prospect park on Memorial Sunday.

One can readily understand Mr. Osborn's perplexity and doubt as to the value of the Boy Scout scheme when he observes how great an asset it becomes under proper leadership and how detrimental it may become when misdirected. Possibly a word of explanation will clear the atmosphere.

There are two Boy Scout movements in this country—the Boy Scouts of America and the American Boy Scouts, the former working in cooperation with the Boy Scout scheme as originally organized and promoted in England by Sir Robert Baden-Powell. The Boy Scouts of America is a movement rather than an organization, its aim being to supplement the work of Sunday schools and other institutions that are concerned with the development of character in adolescent boys. Wherever organized in connection with a Sunday school, its leadership and supervision is chosen by the church or Sunday school in the same manner that the superintendent of the Sunday school selects a teacher for a boys' class. We require that such leader train the boys in the faith and ideals of the church or Sunday school with which they are connected. Its program is absolutely nonmilitary. Military drill and military parades, as such, are discouraged. The use of guns is forbidden. Peace scouting is promoted. This includes woodcraft, observation, tracking, signaling, camping and scoutcraft in general.

The latter organization, the American Boy Scouts, was more recently started by William Randolph Hearst of The New York American as a military organization. It is recognized neither in this country nor abroad as having any connection with the worldwide Boy Scout movement. The membership of this organization is small, the greater part of the boys connected with it living in and around Greater New York. The boys referred to in Mr. Osborn's article are of this latter organization.

The fence at the edge of the precipice, and the ambulance at the bottom

Up the steep slopes of toil multitudes have climbed, reaching the summit of maturity and, at length, descending toward disability and old age.

The downward way is perilous and full of pitfalls. Its greatest danger is the Precipice of Poverty, with the yawning chasm of privation and want below.

Some few are able to walk along the edge of the precipice without losing their heads or their hearts; many stumble and not a few utterly fall.

Shall we build a strong fence at the edge of the precipice or have an ambulance at the bottom? Any sensible man will say, "Both." To refuse to send the ambulance with its white-robed messengers of relief would be inhuman. So long as a single soul is liable to step over the edge of the precipice the ambulance should be "in call" night and day. To refuse to build the fence with its protection against the fall would be unjustifiable. So long as men must walk the hazardous path of old age and disability, they should be amply protected against the ravages of poverty in their declining years.

The Presbyterian Church, with its departments of Sustentation and Relief, is both "building a fence" and "providing an ambulance" for those of its faithful servants who have come and who will come to their day of disability.

Will you help to "build the fence" and to "maintain the ambulance"? Then support the endowment campaign of pating in sham battles and numerous other acts on the part of an organization whose only similarity to the great worldwide Boy Scout movement is its name, has led to considerable confusion in the public mind and a certain amount of distrust on the part of Christian people who are concerned with the religious training of boys.

all this to do with the fabric now spread before us?"

"If you wait you'll find out." Elise was measuring breadths as she spoke. "So Mrs. Hucke can't get time to sew for herself and she's worried about wearing out her best dress, though she didn't think I knew it. She showed me this along with her photographs and worsted flowers. She felt obliged to entertain me, since I was there on her invitation. It was in her sewing basket, with the pattern on top and the scissors beside it, as if she had hopes for the future. But in the same basket were little blouses cut out and basted and a sack for the old lady and some curtains to hem for the shop. Of course she'd do every one of them before she sewed for herself, and by that time there'd be a hole through her alpaca elbow—it's shiny now."

"And then?"

"Then I remembered twelve indolent damsels doing trashy fancy work and hating it and each other. I recalled the fact that they were sighing for new fields to conquer and begging for straight seams and sensible hems, so I brought this."

"Of all the cool——"

"Elise, did she realize our inexperience?"

"My dear, must I tell you again, she doesn't know our deep designs? She loaned it to me at my urgent request to show Aunt Alice. She took it for granted that Aunt Alice was going to want one like it, and she was delighted to accommodate me. I smuggled the pattern."

"I didn't think this of you, Elise."

"Well, you can readjust your opinion, then, while I go call Aunt Alice. We've wasted time enough. I really think she'd better cut it out, because I'm not—er—a finished dressmaker. Then, my friends, we'll make it, fore and aft, as Sailor John says. Pack up your trumpery, but leave out needles and thimbles; you'll need them."

Of course they fell into line—there was nothing else left to do. Fifteen minutes later the Pleasure Club had adjourned to Aunt Alice's room and a second quarter hour saw its members' fingers flying, while the sewing machine hummed, the big shears snipped and every eye sparkled as if there had never been such a thing as discontent. The pattern proved to be simple, Aunt Alice was a wonderful planner and many hands make light work. If you were to be told that the gown was practically finished that very evening, and that it only remained for Aunt Alice and Elise to add the final touches next day, you might be incredulous. But incredulity doesn't alter facts, and the girls hadn't enjoyed anything so much for months. "We'll forgive you, Elise," they declared, as they took their leave at dark. "Bring on the blouses for next time."

"I think I will," was the response. And, sure enough, she did. She carried the bundle next day, all carefully folded and demurely wrapped. "Thank you so much," she said sweetly. "Aunt Alice liked it ever so. Two dozen doughnuts, please. Papa thinks nobody makes them like you. Good-by!" The front door shut hastily behind her as Mrs. Hucke picked up the package she had left.

"I'll unroll it and put it back into the basket," that little woman said to herself. "Maybe the time to cut it out will come unexpected, some day." She rubbed an investigating finger over the shiny elbow as she went toward the sewing basket and an anxious wrinkle tried to fix itself between her eyes, only to be banished by a determined smile as the little shopkeeper hummed one line of her favorite hymn, "The Lord will provide."

Then she unwrapped it and next she rubbed her eyes and stared. After that she looked at the pattern, at the empty space in the sewing basket, at the neat buttons down the new front and Aunt Alice's beautiful buttonholes. At last she understood, and the very first thing she exclaimed was, "I said he would provide, but I didn't know he had already done it." She waited to thank him first of all before she hung away the alpaca with a relieved sigh and put on her treasure to show to groszmutter and "die kinder."

They all enjoyed it. Not a girl of the twelve but had an errand in that shop inside the next three days on purpose to be waited on by the new print gown that fitted like a glove and fairly reflected its owner's thankfulness.

"Who'd ever want to spoil good linen with horrid splotches like mine when they might be accomplishing something like that?" demanded Susanne of Gladys as the little bell tinkled behind them.

"Not I. Say, Susanne, couldn't we girls manage a new alpaca for her some of these days? Miss Alice would help us to plan the thing somehow so it wouldn't look like charity."

"I'd like nothing better. My Irish crochet collar shall be sewed to it hard and fast, and that will ease my conscience for the time I've wasted on it."

They did it, of course. Twelve determined girls—because the other ten added their quota of determination as soon as the hint was dropped—with an Aunt Alice to aid and abet, can overcome bigger obstacles than that proved to be. For a convenient birthday and judicious acceptance of ginger pound cakes evened things up beautifully. "I have enjoyed this so much I wish we had another to go at right away," said Jessie at the next club meeting.

"Well, it may not be a black alpaca, but there is always something ready for nimble hands and willing hearts," declared Aunt Alice.

"Find it for us, Miss Alice. We'll do it, gladly," the Pleasure Club promised as one voice. And they kept their word.

Down in the little shop near the unfashionable end of Grand avenue Mrs. Hucke was talking to the old grandmother in the language both understood. "It wasn't my way or my time, groszmutter, but a much better way and an earlier time," she said. "When I sing that hymn I always try to feel patient enough to wait for my blessings, but here the Lord surprised me by supplying my want almost before I realized it. You see, we don't always need resignation. Sometimes what we need is just pure thankfulness, and this is one of the times, groszmutter."

The old woman agreed with a happy nod, while over in the corner among their blocks Hans and Karl were singing as they often did—they were great singers, those youngsters—a verse that ran like this:

"And this be the token
No word he hath spoken
Was ever yet broken,
The Lord will provide."

Has Gathered Many Into Schools

More than ten Sunday school pupils each day for the past twenty-one years have been enrolled through the efforts of Thomas Scotton, missionary for the board in Minnesota. During this time he has organized and revived 278 schools, one each month, and from these every six months has grown a church, a total of forty-three. He went from Massachusetts to the West and most of the time he has made Willmar headquarters, covering fourteen counties of 10,000 square miles, with nearly 300,000 persons. In the schools which he has fathered there are 6,847 teachers and officers and 79,898 pupils. He has given a large quantity of religious literature and has held 335 Sabbath school institutes and has organized many Christian Endeavor societies as well as conducting frequent evangelistic services.

Would Discuss Christian Education

Dr. J. E. Clarke, associate secretary of the College Board at Nashville, Tenn., has issued programs for conferences on Christian education which will be held by many presbyteries this fall. The College Board, Board of Education and Board of Sabbath School Work are working together on this widespread campaign.

Using Tent for Summer Meetings

Home Missionary Is Aiding Churches—Bible Class for Young People Has New Idea to Incite Interest.

SPOKANE—Rev. Ira L. Crooks, home missionary of two or three congregations in the Columbia River valley, is making a successful summer evangelistic campaign, using a tent. Meetings have been held at Rice and Daisy, and Gifford. Members have been added and the churches strengthened.

The new church at Opportunity is using its opportunity in up-to-date methods. A young people's Bible class has been formed modeled after the commission form of government. Five commissioners are elected for a term of six months. Each has charge of a department of the work. The first has charge of the Bibles and helps, cares for and promotes their use. Another looks after the membership, and others social affairs, social service, and the last leads and assists in developing prayer, devotion and worship. S. M. Ware, D. D., pastor, has outlined a series of interesting song and praise services. A theme is selected and subdivided and suitable songs are chosen to express and impress the ideas. Such subjects as "The Home Land," "Salvation," "The Journey of Life, Helps and Hindrances" and "Child Life" are used. This has been tried by other churches and the effect is good.

Rev. Conrad Bluhm of Centenary church preached a strong sermon recently urging the enforcement of the new "abatement law," which went into effect June 14. He characterized it as "womanhood's bill of rights" and the first step in the eradication of the commercial and public social evil. This law provides for the arrest of the owner of the building, and if found guilty the furniture is seized and sold and the money used to pay the expense of the trial. The building is closed for six months and the owner may be fined and imprisoned. This law is copied after the Iowa statute.

Says Sunday Games Are Illegal

Sabbath Observance Friends Rejoiced at Decision—Nurses to Instruct "Little Mothers"—Four Pulpits Vacant.

PHILADELPHIA—Much gratification is felt by the friends of Sabbath observance over the recent decision of Judge W. C. Ryan that Sunday baseball playing is illegal in Pennsylvania. Dr. T. T. Mutchler, secretary of the Philadelphia Sabbath Association, has mailed 10,000 copies of the decision to ministers, lawyers and district attorneys of eastern Pennsylvania.

Among those from a distance supplying Philadelphia pulpits in July were Rev. John Lomond of Edinburgh, Scotland, who had been attending the world's citizenship conference at Portland, Ore.; Willard H. Robinson, D. D., of Chicago; F. W. Loetscher of Princeton Theological Seminary and Clarence G. Reynolds of Elizabeth, N. J.

"Little mothers' leagues" are being formed by the Child Hygiene Association of the city. One such was organized in the Presbyterian Italian mission recently. It consisted of eight little girls ranging from 10 to 13 years of age, who elected their officers and will meet weekly to be instructed by one of the municipal nurses.

At the recent meeting of Philadelphia North Presbytery upon motion of Franklin L. Sheppard, a commissioner to the late General Assembly, a committee was appointed to consider the desirability of overturing General Assembly for a clearer definition and limitation of the powers and duties of its Executive Commission.

Presbyterian churches of Germantown hold a union service, as in preceding summers, the Sunday evenings of July and August and first Sunday of September. The service July 20 was held in Market Square and the preacher was Rev. William H. Johnson of Lincoln University.

A number of groups of churches of different denominations throughout the city are holding union services. Oxford Presbyterian, Rev. John H. Francis pastor, unites with Reformed Episcopal, Lutheran, Baptist and Methodist.

Rev. S. W. Steckel, late pastor of First church of Providence, R. I., is now a resident of this city and is supplying the pulpit of Greenwich Street church during the illness of its pastor, Dr. William Hutton. Mr. Steckel was formerly pastor of Hebron Memorial church.

The children of Rev. Robert M. Labaree, missionary and former pastor of Doylestown church, are left $300 by the will of the late Mrs. Eliza C. Walker.

FOUR CHURCHES WITHOUT PASTORS

Four important Presbyterian churches in Philadelphia are now without pastors. They are Tabernacle and Tennent Memorial in the residential section of West Philadelphia; Third or "Old Pine," a downtown church in a mission district, and Arch Street, fast being surrounded by business houses. All have fine properties, loyal constituencies and promising fields. Some have considerable endowments.

The men's organized Bible class of Richardson Memorial church, Dr. O. G. McDowell pastor, has arranged for a series of Sunday afternoon talks to men by prominent laymen during July and August.

Second church has lost a useful and beloved official member and the city an upright citizen and prominent banker in the sudden death at Prouts Neck, Me., of John Sailer. Charles Wood, D. D., of Washington, D. C., his former pastor and devoted friend, conducted the funeral service.

Catholics Barred from Service

Priest Forbids Members of Church to Attend High School Baccalaureate—Organized Opposition to Sabbath Breaking.

BALTIMORE—Catholics were forbidden by their priest from attending the baccalaureate exercises of the graduating class of the high school of Lonaconing. It has heretofore been the custom for the high school to hold religious services in the church of the minister who preaches the sermon. On account of the larger seating capacity of the high school, services this year were held in that building. Rev. H. L. Earnest of Lonaconing preached the sermon. The morning of the exercises the priest forbade his people to attend this service upon pain of excommunication. One of the graduates was a Catholic, and the wife of one of the teachers, a Catholic, was on the program to assist in singing a duet. There were no Catholics in the audience and the change in the program excited considerable discussion in the town. There has been talk of dismissing all Catholic teachers, although it is expected that the incident will be allowed to be forgotten without this action.

W. W. Davis, D. D., secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance of Maryland, is making a hard fight against Sabbath desecration, particularly in the resorts surrounding Baltimore, and is making it so wisely and strongly that he is having great success. The crusade against vice and the saloon in Baltimore has driven many into the outlying territory, and here the work is just now being pressed. Conferences of neighboring churches and their workers are held in various sections to learn of the conditions and then to plan to cooperate with Dr. Davis in the county court. July 13 such a conference of the churches near the Maryland Steel Company's works was held in Sparrows Point church.

United Church Again Separated

North-Covenant Congregations to Maintain Different Organizations—Plan a $20,000 Structure in Near Future.

ST. LOUIS—An effort was made a year and a half ago to unite two North side churches, both of which had good congregations and property. Since that time North and Covenant churches have been known as North-Covenant church, with Rev. W. D. Vater as pastor. At the July meeting of presbytery, however, a dissolution was granted, and the Church of the Covenant will now reorganize and continue as before the union in its own commodious building on North Grand avenue. Good feeling exists between the two bodies, but after a conference, at which a committee of presbytery was present, it was concluded that there was good reason for two churches, each in its separate field.

Dr. George Frederick Ayers, president of Lindenwood College, has been seriously ill for some months, and at the meeting of presbytery July 14 prayers of gratitude were offered for his recovery, which now seems to be certain.

McCausland Avenue church, of which W. S. Foreman, D. D., is pastor, is planning the erection of a new building to cost about $20,000.

Rev. C. M. Rauch, who has been pastor of Cote Brilliante church for twelve years, tendered his resignation July 13. The following day at a meeting of presbytery the relationship was dissolved and Mr. Rauch will spend the summer at Lafayette, Ind. The church will continue his salary until Sept. 1. Mr. Rauch went to Cote Brilliante after having been assistant to Dr. S. J. Niccolls of Second church. By a unanimous rising vote presbytery expressed its appreciation of Mr. Rauch's long service.

Some years ago a real estate firm which was promoting the sale of land in a suburb, Southampton, offered ground for a church to presbytery. The offer was not accepted. A Sunday school has now been organized in Southampton by the presbyterial Sunday school missionary, Rev. A. Hilkemann, and it will be officered and supported by Tyler Place church, John L. Roemer, D. D., minister. Dr. R. R. Vaughn, an elder in Tyler Place, will be superintendent.

Prayers Replace Indian Orgies

The Nez Perce Indian mission is the glory of the Synod of Washington. There are six churches with their own native ministers, all trained by Miss Kate McBeth, who for thirty years has been their teacher and missionary. Every year they have their camp meeting, assisted by some invited white ministers. Their camp is on the reservation where they have held it for four years. Rev. John Lee of Seattle trained the chorus this year; Rev. Charles R. Scofe of Spokane conducted the Bible readings daily and W. O. Forbes, D. D., preached the communion sermon and conducted special meetings daily for children. The rendering of the cantata "Joseph" on the evening of July 8 marked the close of the gathering. This is the fifteenth annual camp meeting held by the Nez Perces to take the place of the Fourth of July war dances of the wild Indians.

In connection with Cooper College, Sterling, Kan., a conference on Christian work will be held Aug. 22-31. The daily Bible study hour will be under the direction of Dr. Joseph Kyle. Professor G. B. McCreary of Sterling is in general charge of arrangements.

CLOUDED BRAIN

Clears Up on Change to Proper Food

The brain cannot work with clearness and accuracy if the food taken is not fully digested, but is retained in the stomach to ferment and form poisonous gases, etc. A dull, clouded brain is likely to be the result.

A Michigan lady relates her experience in changing her food habits, and results are very interesting:

"A steady diet of rich, greasy foods, such as sausage, buckwheat cakes and so on, finally broke down a stomach and nerves that, by inheritance, were sound and strong, and medicine did no apparent good in the way of relief.

"My brain was clouded and dull and I was suffering from a case of constipation that defied all remedies used.

"The 'Road to Wellville,' in some providential way, fell into my hands, and may heaven's richest blessings fall on the man who was inspired to write it.

"I followed directions carefully, the physical culture and all, using Grape-Nuts with sugar and cream, leaving meat, pastry and hot biscuits entirely out of my bill of fare. The result—I am in perfect health once more.

"I never realize I have nerves, and my stomach and bowels are in fine condition. My brain is perfectly clear and I am enjoying that state of health which God intended his creatures should enjoy, and which all might have, by giving proper attention to their food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Dr. Cadman Rejects the Proffer

Prefers to Remain in Brooklyn—United Charities Send Away Many Mothers and Children for Vacation.

CHICAGO—Officers of Second church, who had hoped to obtain Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, the Congregational preacher of Brooklyn, as a successor to Dr. John Balcom Shaw, have been notified by Dr. Cadman that he prefers to stay in the East. In declining the call he says, "I cannot conceive a greater necessity, a greater opportunity or a more hearty and loyal response than this beloved Brooklyn and New York City presents today."

A school for colored boys to be known as the Louise Training School will be established at 6130 South Ada street. The trustees include a number of prominent Presbyterians of the city.

The United Charities have sent out of the city over 5,000 mothers and children for a summer outing already this year. Indications are that the organization will receive requests from at least 5,000 more than were originally expected, and there is need for larger contributions.

There has been in session this week at Olivet Camp the first conference for the discussion of church problems. The conference opened Monday morning with an address by Rev. B. F. Aldrich of the New First Congregational church, Chicago. The conference will close Saturday morning with a discussion on the need of keeping the spiritual side uppermost in an institutional church.

Mrs. Mary J. Nye, wife of Rev. R. H. Nye, a former pastor of Elwood church, died July 10. They had made Elwood their home for some years. At the funeral service Saturday afternoon Dr. John Welsh of Wilmington was in charge, assisted by Dr. C. M. Brown, Rev. C. D. Jacobs and Rev. F. W. Kirkpatrick of Joliet.

FIFTY-THREE CHURCHES GAIN

Of the ninety-seven churches of Chicago Presbytery reporting this year thirty-six show a decrease in the total membership compared with 1912. The total falling off in communicants of Chicago Presbytery was 569. There were four churches, however, which together show a decrease of 464 members. There were fifty-three churches which show gains in membership, of which the largest was by Buena Memorial, with a net increase of 131, although Fourth church had the largest number of accessions on confession. Olivet Memorial comes second with an increase of ninety members. Of the churches which show an increase in membership this year over a year ago there are seventeen which increased ten or less. The favorable location of many of the churches with respect to the trend of population has had much to do with the changes shown by some congregations, although it is probably fair to judge the average Presbyterian activity of the city by the total membership figure.

Sixth church has reversed its custom of the ast four years and the Sunday school is takng no vacation this summer. A simplified ervice is being conducted, in charge of a ommittee, and a short address from the platorm has been substituted for the regular lesons in the classes.

Work among the boys of Emerald Avenue hurch is progressing with the forming of a oy Scout organization a few days ago.

Dr. W. P. Merrill of New York and Dr. oseph W. Cochran of Philadelphia have been ecent preachers in Chicago pulpits.

A total of 465 students have attended the ummer session of the institute and training chool of the Y. M. C. A. which has been eld at the Geneva camp of the association. he graduating exercises of the summer classes ke place July 24.

Howard B. McAfee, president of the Presyterian Training School, reports a continued emand for young women for various places assistants to pastors in the Presbyterian d other denominations.

At a recent communion at Moody church ere were twelve nationalities represented in e forty new members.

A citywide campaign for the enforcement the Sunday closing law and city ordinances ncerning vice has been planned by the women Cook county. This is one of the evidences a larger interest by women in public affairs Chicago.

Seventh church is so badly crowded that classes in Sunday school are almost impossible. A new building, it is said, will be needed soon.

Help for Ruined Churches Is Small

Notwithstanding the great amount of work that the Dayton flood relief committee has put forth to inform the churches throughout the whole country of the situation in Dayton Presbytery as a result of the recent flood, there is said to be widespread misunderstanding. Undoubtedly the announcement made by the Red Cross to the effect that no further funds were needed has had its effect on this committee's work. Dr. J. C. Hill, chairman, says it should be clearly understood that the churches receive nothing whatever from the Red Cross fund. The work of this committee is to raise money for the rehabilitation of the churches that were injured through the flood and not for personal relief.

The total amount so far received is ridiculously small compared with the enormous need. Funds should be sent to John S. Crowell, Springfield, Ohio, treasurer.

Preparing for United Campaign

Teams to Hold Conferences in All Parts of the Country—Brooklyn Gets New Y. M. C. A. Building—Dr. Bates Dies in Peru.

NEW YORK—Fifteen teams are being formed to have charge of conferences in a large number of cities in preparation for the every-member canvass to be undertaken in this country next March. The united campaign begins in September and the various denominations are loaning their best leaders to undertake this work of interesting the churches to to their full task. David McConaughy, eastern district secretary for the Foreign Board, is in charge of the work in New Jersey and has plans under way to reach fifty-seven centers in that commonwealth, commencing at Atlantic City Sept. 21. Teams to cover other portions of the East are also at work. This campaign is felt to register the high water mark in Christian cooperation. The plans of the Laymen's Missionary Movement and the Men and Religion campaigns are being utilized.

The Brooklyn Y. M. C. A. has received a gift of $500,000 from Mrs. W. V. R. Smith toward the erection of a building on Hanson place. The location is in the heart of a thickly populated district and is accessible from practically every section of Brooklyn and Manhattan because of the many transit lines that converge at this point. The building will cover a plot 200 by 105 feet and will be ten to twelve stories in height, in addition to two basements. With the land and furnishings the plant will cost about $1,000,000. Because of the splendid gift of Mrs. Smith the building, by vote of the directors and trustees, will be called "The Clarence E. Smith Memorial Building." Mr. Smith was born in Pittsburg and when quite a young man he came with his father, William Van Rensselaer Smith, to Brooklyn, where he resided until 1904, when he removed to Manhattan, where he died in 1910.

Ask Study of Japanese Problem

Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, has received a memorial from the Japan mission of the American Board of Missions relative to friendly relations between the people of Japan and the United States. The missionaries deplore unfriendly race legislation and request the Federal Council, which represents the Protestant churches of America, to appoint a commission to study this whole question, and that it seek to rally the Christian forces of the United States for the promoting of such measures as are in accord with the highest standards of Christian statesmanship. The missionaries state it as their belief that the solution of the question is to be secured not by the adjustment of treaties, nor the modification of laws, but only by the activity of the Christians of America.

Ross Street, South Third Street and First United Presbyterian churches of Williamsburg have joined with several Baptist, Congregational and Methodist churches for union summer services.

West-Park church is among those to remain open all summer. Supplies will be Dr. Elliott W. Brown, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, Dr. Joseph D. Burrell and Dr. Arthur J. Brown.

Miss Ida Mabel Reeve of Newark, N. J., has recently been appointed superintendent of girls' work in John Hall Memorial chapel.

At the union services of West End church held in Hope Baptist church during the summer Elliott W. Brown, D. D., of Northfield, preaches next Sunday. The supplies for August will be Vernon l'Anson, D. D., Norfolk, Va.; Robert Baker, D. D., Bristol, England, and Rev. George H. Wales, Philadelphia.

Presbytery Owns Labor Temple

Labor temple has become the property of New York Presbytery. Heretofore it has been owned by Greenwich church and leased to the Church Extension Society for an annual rental of $10,000. The extension society has purchased the property for $200,000. The past quarter has been the most successful of any in the history of Labor temple. The pastor, Dr. Jonathan C. Day, reports an attendance during the months of April, May and June of 50,000, of which 21,000 was on Sundays.

Roswell H. Bates, D. D., who has been pastor of Spring Street church for the past twelve years, and who recently left for a long sea voyage in hopes of recovering his health, died in Peru on July 16. Dr. Bates has wielded great influence, especially among young men who were training for the ministry and were privileged to be associated with the institutional work of Spring Street Neighborhood house. Rev. W. D. Barnes, Jr., the associate minister, is filling the pulpit temporarily.

Well Known Sunday School Worker Is Accidentally Killed

William B. Jacobs

William B. Jacobs, for twenty-nine years general secretary of the Illinois State Sunday School Association and for many years superintendent of the Sunday school of Sixth church, Chicago, was accidentally killed in Chicago the morning of July 16. He was crushed between two street cars on Wabash avenue as he was starting to his office. He was born in Goshen, Ind., seventy-three years ago and is said to have received the impetus to devote himself to Christian work during the civil war. He took a leading part in the Christian association which was formed for the benefit of the soldiers during that struggle.

Some years after the Chicago fire Mr. Jacobs left the commission business in which he was engaged to become secretary of the State Sunday School Association at a salary of $400 a year. Largely through his executive power and ability Illinois is said to be the best organized state from a Sunday school standpoint in the union. Two years ago he voluntarily retired as secretary and was succeeded by Hugh Cork, who is now abroad, having attended the convention at Zurich.

Mr. Jacobs discovered in connection with his work that there were many Sunday school supplies not readily available, so a number of years ago he established a Sunday school publishing house, in which he had since been interested. He at one time was a contributor to the church departments of The Continent and was widely known in the Central West. His brother, the late B. F. Jacobs, was even better known in Sunday school work, having been active in the international association for many years. Mr. Jacobs is survived by a widow and four daughters, one of whom was the wife of Rev. Hubert Brown, a missionary in Mexico, who died recently. Mr. Jacobs was a tither and will be remembered by many worthy institutions for his modest but regular gifts. Dr. W. P. Merrill of New York, former pastor of Sixth church, officiated at the funeral.

Ministerial Obituary

Rev. Charles M. Ruland

Rev. Charles M. Ruland died at Crosby, Minn., July 7 of heart failure. He was born at Rockford, Ill., Feb. 14, 1882, and ordained in November, 1911, by St. Cloud Presbytery. He had charge of the churches at Greenleaf and Spring Grove. He began his work at Crosby in November, 1912, and was installed pastor of Deerwood and Crosby churches May 27, 1913, and on the next day was married to Miss Myrtle Matthews of Crosby. He was a graduate of Princeton Seminary. The funeral was held from Crosby church July 10. S. F. Sharpless, D. D.; Rev. W. J. Lowrie and Rev. Mr. Gasly conducted the service.

Having been elected to a position in connection with the College Board, C. H. French, D. D., president of Huron College for the past fifteen years, has tendered his resignation from the college. The College Board will utilize his excellent talent as a promoter of colleges and persuader of contributions.

Try to Stop Lecture on Luther

Riot in Carnegie Hall, Pittsburg—Composer Nevin to Be Honored at Sewickley, Where He Was Organist.

PITTSBURG—A recent riot in Pittsburg over the giving of a lecture on Martin Luther in Carnegie hall, North side, by Rev. Wallace Tharp, pastor of First Christian church, has been brought to the attention of the city council. The police department of the city seemed disposed to ignore the complaints. The lecture was given under the auspices of the Guardians of Liberty and charges have been made that certain persons made an effort to storm the meeting and to prevent the giving of it. Last Thursday warrants were issued for the arrest of ten persons, and a public hearing was set for July 22.

The late Ethelbert W. Nevin, author of "My Rosary" and famous as a composer of music, is to be honored by his friends and admirers. Steps are being taken to raise money for the erection of a monument over his grave at Sewickley. A benefit will be held in First church of Sewickley, where the deceased was organist when a young man, and funds will be solicited from all who desire to help.

A strenuous effort is being made by the friends of Blairsville College for Women to save it from bankruptcy. The announcement was made at the close of the last term that unless funds were forthcoming the doors would be closed. An appeal is being made to the alumni, now scattered all over the country, and encouraging reports are coming in. If sufficient funds are received the college will continue with an enlarged curriculum.

Rev. J. R. Thomas, pastor of Oakland Welsh church, has been called by Ebensberg Congregational church.

Rev. Charles Snoke, pastor of East End church, Pittsburg, will be given an extended vacation by the congregation on account of illness.

P. W. SNYDER.

Seattle Churches Are Progressing

Five churches in Seattle Presbytery came to self-support this year, viz.: Seattle Georgetown, Rev. T. Henry Lewis pastor; Seattle Green Lake, Rev. A. A. J. Hogg pastor; Bremerton, Auburn and Vashon, Rev. W. H. Koper, F. L. Hayden, D. D., and Rev. A. N. Smith pastors respectively.

Rev. A. A. J. Hogg of Green Lake church celebrated his first anniversary in June with special services, reporting eighty-four accessions during the year and vigorous growth in many ways. Dr. Silsley welcomed sixty members the last Sunday of June, making 300 received in his eighteen months at Westminster church, and Rev. N. B. Harrison welcomed twenty-one July 13, making 215 accessions during his twenty months' pastorate in University church.

Church people showed great interest in the National Conference of Charities and Corrections July 5-12. Preliminary to this conference the National Children's Home Society held a three days' session, with much profit.

Dr. Motoda, head of St. Paul's School in Toyko, Japan, created much interest on his visit to Seattle. He addressed a mass meeting of 400 Japanese Christians of all denominations, spoke before the Central Council of Oriental Missions, the Central Council of Social Agencies and the united women's auxiliaries of the city. He was one of the speakers before the world's Christian citizenship conference in Portland and is addressing chautauqua assemblies on the coast with great acceptance.

Four graduates of Princeton Seminary, 1913, appeared before Olympia Presbytery for licensure and ordination on July 22. They are all located in mission stations of the presbytery.

The pastoral relation between Rev. J. M. Robinson and Port Blakeley church was dissolved by Seattle Presbytery June 30 that Dr. Robinson might accept a call to the Sunday school missionary work of the Presbyteries of Bellingham and Wenatchee.

First Presbyterian, U. P., Methodist, Baptist, Christian and Congregational churches of Olympia have joined for the months of July and August in an evening service under the direction of the ministers' association. A vesper service at 4:30 o'clock is held in the park, a union young people's meeting precedes this at the Y. M. C. A. and a union prayer meeting is held at the same place on Thursday evening. The attendance has been gratifying.

A very enjoyable meeting was held at the manse of Olympia First church recently, when all members of the church over sixty years of age were entertained by the pastor and his wife. There were over fifty present. Daniel C. Beaty and his wife are charter members, having been received into the church in 1854, and are 84 and 80 years respectively. This church is the oldest in "the Oregon country," being founded by Dr. George F. Whitworth in 1854.

A movement is on foot among the young people's societies of Olympia to establish a loggers' rest in the city in order that the men who come to the city may have some place to go other than a saloon.

The home department of the Bible school of First church, Spokane, especially prepared a picnic given July 8 in commemoration of the opening day of the world's Sunday school convention at Zurich, Switzerland. Mrs. Shore, with her corps of members, served a sumptuous dinner at Manito park. The meeting was called to order with prayer by Mrs. S. Willis McFadden, followed with remarks by different members.

Ohio

The congregation at Westerville dedicated a new church house of modern convenience costing about $30,000 Sunday, July 13. Rev. George S. J. Browne of Cincinnati preached the sermon and Dr. J. W. Day of Columbus assisted in the services. The previous Sunday, at the first communion service in the new building, the church, although now without a pastor, received a large number to membership.

New York

Led by the joint effort of Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist and Episcopal churches, the community of which Gilbertsville is the center had its second annual sane Fourth and holiday celebration, a fusileer parade, band concert, with five brass bands in attendance; free public dinner, and ball game, with over 500 people in attendance. No one was hurt, and all enjoyed themselves in a sane and rational manner.

Work has commenced on the new building at Spencer, which will cost about $11,500.

The Sunday school pageant parade in Auburn June 23 was participated in by eighteen schools, represented by 3,926 persons. The parade is reported to have made a profound impression on the public at large.

During an unusually severe hail storm July 13 most of the five stained glass windows on the west side of Cohocton church were materially damaged.

Rev. Thomas Houston, the blind evangelist, who recently held meetings in Garfield, assisted in welcoming a large number of members July 6. Rev. W. A. Wager is pastor.

Huron church, North Rose, celebrated its 100th aniversary July 18-20 with a picnic and special services. The pastor, Rev. J. Meulendyke, and Dr. George E. Davies of St. Paul, Minn., preached.

First church, Wolcott, celebrated its centennial July 16-20. The speakers were Dr. Rice, a former pastor, Rev. L. Mason Clarke, pastor First church, Brooklyn, and Rev. C. Clarence Baker, pastor.

Illinois

Rev. Paul C. Elliott was installed pastor of Winstanley Park church, East St. Louis, July 10. Rev. C. A. Highfield of Belleville, Rev. Alfred O. Elliott of Canton, a brother of the pastor, and Rev. Wilson Aull of East St. Louis took part.

Rev. C. E. Fisk, Ph. D., took charge of Viola church eight years ago, at which time it had a membership of ninety. During the eight years 128 have been received. A new Sunday school room costing $1,600 was built a year ago. Dr. Fisk leaves Viola to take up work at Grand Ridge Aug. 1.

Second church, Decatur, believes that Bible stories can be made more effective by dramatization. In this it is most fortunate in Miss Emma Baker, a dramatic artist, and Miss Fay Fisher, who has charge of rehearsals. Among Figs from Thistles?

Man reaps what he sows. A nation does likewise. What will be the effect on the America of tomorrow of the incoming Poles, Italians and Russians? Can we permit the children of immigrants, severed from the religious and moral ties of their home, to absorb the evil of city and country without fear of the consequences? To reach these newcomers through religious leaders speaking their own language is Christian strategy. Dubuque German College and Seminary is training young men to be such leaders. Bible incidents recently dramatized in evening services are "The Ten Virgins" and "The Finding of Moses."

For the first time in thirty years First church, Freeport, is free of debt, a mortgage of $4,500 having recently been canceled. One member of the congregation subscribed $3,500 on condition that the church would raise $3,000.

Massachusetts

Full Grown Church Added

Boston Presbytery at an adjourned meeting July 8 adopted a report of the home missions committee concerning a petition from Union Christian church, Everett, which requested to be received by presbytery. The church has forty-five members, a Sabbath school of over 100 scholars and eleven teachers. The property is valued at $4,000, besides two lots, with a debt of only $1,200, situated in a growing part of the city of Everett.

Roxbury church has so prospered during the pastorate of Dr. C. A. Young that it has decided to enlarge the building to meet demands and spend $20,000 on the improvements.

The church in Quincy has recently installed an organ which cost $1,800, half of which was provided by Andrew Carnegie. The work of this church moves forward under the leadership of the pastor, Rev. James A. Matheson.

Dr. H. A. Manchester, pastor of East Boston church for thirteen years, has been offered the appointment of pastor in Union church of the English-speaking community in Peking, China. He has the matter under consideration, and should he decide to accept it will be a great loss to Presbyterianism in Boston and New England.

Fourth church, Boston, continues to grow as much during the second pastorate there of Dr. James Todd as it did when he began his first pastorate in it nine years ago. The church has purchased a manse which cost $4,100, of which sum $3,200 has been subscribed. Dr. and Mrs. Todd recently received their congregation in their new home, when over 150 attended the reception.

Pennsylvania

The Pen-Mar reunion Thursday, July 31, will be addressed by Henry Breckinridge, assistant secretary of war. It is expected that a large gathering will be present at this annual picnic of Presbyterians of three states.

Upon invitation of the Chester county no-license committee, Charles L. Huston chairman, representatives from five of the prominent counties of eastern Pennsylvania recently met in Coatesville for consultation as to campaigns for closing hotel bars and saloons.

Mrs. Niles, widow of Dr. Henry E. Niles, for many years pastor of York church, and mother of Rev. Edward Niles of Second church, Baltimore, Md., and of Judge Alfred S. Niles of the same city, recently died at the home of her son, Henry C. Niles of York, aged 84.

Fairview church, Chester Presbytery, Rev. E. M. Van Note pastor, recently dedicated a handsome gateway to its grounds and a beautiful window as memorials to Dr. Joseph and Mrs. Henrietta McClure, the former an elder and both lifelong members of the church. The memorials were the gifts of their daughters, Mrs. William Pennock and Miss Margaret McClure of Lyndell. In the services of dedication the pastor was assisted by two former pastors—Rev. William Boyd of Landsdowne and Rev. William Allen, Jr., of Haddonfield, N. J.

The synodical brotherhood committee is pushing its work for men and has just sent its secretary, Rev. F. B. Everitt of Allentown, on a tour of the western presbyteries. Conferences were held in nine presbyteries, and in three others interviews were held with pastors and individual members of committees. The work of this committee has been given new significance by the action of the recent assembly, it being now virtually the synod's committee on men's work. As such, it is meeting with hearty cooperation on the part of pastors and presbyteries.

Iowa

The women's guild of Williamsburg church for the past two years has managed the lecture course for the community more successfully than any organization that ever attempted it. In addition they have a record in their missionary work second to none in the presbytery.

The parsonage at Ireton has been sold and a modern building will be erected on lots adjoining the church.

Indiana

An exceptionally large number of additions were made to Delphi church July 6 following a large amount of personal work by the congregation under the direction of the pastor, Rev. N. P. Patterson. A number of the additions are prominent in business and social circles of the city.

Newspapers report a practical example of church union at Franklin when on a recent Sunday the entire congregation of the Christian church went across the street and worshiped with the Presbyterians, Rev. W. B. Tyler pastor. The visiting minister assisted in the services. The innovation will probably be tried by other congregations.

Wyoming

The Arapahoe Indian mission has been strengthened by the coming of Licentiate E. E. Preston, a recent graduate of Louisville Seminary, and his wife. Mrs. Preston is a graduate nurse, a much needed helper in this field. A church, manse and barn will be erected at once on the ten acres allotted by the Indians.

Six miles from Lost Springs fifty dry farm homesteaders within a radius of five miles wanted an organization, as it was too far to go to town for services. The pastor-evangelist organized a church of fifteen members and July 1 baptized a mother and several children. The people of the community will do the work on the building—there being a number of carpenters in the neighborhood.

North Dakota

Additions are being made to the Sunday school quarters of Mandan church.

The district Christian Endeavor convention held recently at Minot was largely attended.

Plans are being suggested for the building of a new manse at Bismarck. The site of the present building will soon be needed for an addition to the church.

Michigan

Dr. J. A. Dunkel, Warren Avenue church, Saginaw, in a recent sermon condemned the giving of a program of fireworks by the city at the time of church service Sunday night. He suggested that Saginaw needs to build up a reputation for Sabbath observance.

Texas

The congregation of First church, Wichita Falls, is worshiping with the members of the M. E. church, South, during the construction of a new edifice. Rev. J. L. McKee, pastor, alternates with the Methodist minister in preaching.

California

The parish house of the new church at Oakland has been finished and occupied. All the regular church services will be held there until the main auditorium is completed about Sept. 1.

Oklahoma

Following revival meetings conducted by Rev. T. E. Thomas at Perry a large number united with the local church, of which Rev. S. H. Parvin is pastor.

Montana

Rev. Leslie A. Bechtel, a native of Butte, has become pastor of Immanuel church, Butte, which has long been without a minister.

Rhode Island

A Fourth of July firecracker is said to have caused the fire which badly damaged the church at Narragansett Pier at Providence.

New Mexico

Rev. Hugh M. Smith, recently of Winters, Texas, South, has taken up work in Portales, which had for so long a time been discontinued

Financial Situation

Bankers Check Expenses by High Rates—Wall Street Checkmated by Secretary of Treasury—Prices Slightly Lower.

A condition which is termed as "conservative optimism" by Bradstreet's prevails generally in the business world. Sales in some lines by jobbers and manufacturers exceed those of a year ago. Bankers, however, are keeping a close watch upon the uses to which capital is put and during the last few days the money market of the Central West has developed a firmer tendency so that for certain sorts of borrowers the interest rate has reached 7 per cent, the legal limit in Illinois. This is higher than is usual in midsummer, but borrowers have been accustomed to stiff rates for several months and are adjusting their business to the conditions. Banks are said to have sufficient money on hand for all ordinary enterprises. J. J. Mitchell, president of the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank, Chicago, is quoted as saying that the rate is now as high as it will be in November.

Was the Complaint Without Foundation?

The announcement by Secretary McAdoo about a month ago that he was prepared to turn over to banks of the country $500,000,000 of emergency currency should there be a demand for such action, has had a tendency greatly to relieve the money shortage which bankers claim to have existed in New York. This sudden easing up of the situation following the announcement of the secretary of the treasury has revealed what is said to have been a concerted effort on the part of Wall street to show the new administration that it might be involved in serious financial difficulties unless certain conditions were met. New York banks lately have not been complaining of a shortage of money.

Evidence of the tightness of the money market is found in the cost of new capital to those corporations whose credit is questioned. The Northern Pacific, for example, had to pay 6 per cent on one year notes, although it has a large amount of high grade bonds in its treasury. The present low market price of these securities, however, made it inadvisable for the road to attempt to obtain cash for them.

Index Number Is a Little Lower

For the seventh time in as many months the index number indicating the prices of commodities in all lines has shown a decrease, according to the computation by Bradstreet's. The figure for July 1 was 1.3 per cent under that for June 1, but prices now are higher than they have ever been in July, except in 1907 and 1912.

The Financial World recently pointed out that if only $1 a week were saved by the 50,000,000 wage earners or salaried persons of the United States there would in six months be produced an accumulation of $1,210,000,000 of new capital available to borrowers. The fact, however, that this capital is in the hands of widely scattered individuals means that securities must be offered in small denominations in order to coax it into the markets of trade. James J. Hill has recognized this in the offer by the trust company under his control in St. Paul, Minn., of certificates in $10 denominations bearing 4½ per cent interest secured by high grade bonds deposited with trustees.

owing to circumstances over which the Presbytery had no control.

Rev. James A. Armstrong, pastor of Alamogordo church, has just completed a two months' evangelistic campaign in San Juan county. He took no vacation last year and it was agreed that he should have two in one, so he took it by preaching twice a day for eight weeks to other churches.

Jeremiah Moore, D. D., pastor of Clovis First church, who was invited to deliver the annual address before Tusculum College, Tenn., where he was president for twenty-two years, has returned home and is now hard at work in preparation for building a brick church which will be commensurate with the needs of the growing work in that town.

Rev. Hugh A. Cooper is doing double duty in taking care of the Albuquerque sanitarium and church in the absence of Rev. C. H. Foreman. The sanitarium is growing steadily and is becoming more and more a great factor of benevolence and blessing to an increasing number of people afflicted with the white plague. Mr. Cooper's recent visit to the East was fruitful of good results, and new buildings are being projected.

Colorado

A Sabbath school institute participated in by Messrs. Steidley, Schureman, Wilson and Powell was conducted at Burdett, twenty-three miles from Akron, July 8. A picnic dinner was served.

Fort Collins First church is getting started on its new building, which will be one of the most complete working plants in the entire West. It has grown out of the imperative demands of the extensive and growing work. The cost will be about $40,000.

Abbott church, thirty-five miles from Akron, was dedicated by the pastor-evangelist July 6. At the same time a Sabbath school institute was conducted with Professor Steidley, educational superintendent of synod, the pastor-evangelist and the student pastor, H. T. Wilson of McCormick, assisting. The people came from a radius of thirty-five miles, with the temperature reaching 108 in the shade. The building is frame and was dedicated free of debt, all but $175 being raised in the sparsely settled neighborhood.

Tennessee

St. Mark's church, Rogersville, celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of W. H. Franklin, D. D., as its minister and the dedication of its new church Sabbath, July 6. The anniversary included the preaching of the anniversary sermon by the pastor and the dedication sermon by Rev. J. M. Ewing of Rose Hill, Va. The church stands among the very best of the freedmen's churches. During the thirty years the pastor has organized and dedicated a majority of the churches constituting Rogersville Presbytery. To the very great regret of the church and people he has resigned from the church to give his entire time to Swift Memorial College. The church has been without a house of worship for several years and has been worshiping in the college chapel. Last year, through the kindness of the Freedmen's and the Church Erection Boards, the church began an edifice to cost about $3,000. The building was completed last November. It is located on the college grounds.

Wisconsin

The congregation of Christ church, Madison, under the auspices of the Laymen's Missionary Movement will support a missionary pastor in the foreign field.

The daily vacation Bible schools of Milwaukee began a six weeks' session July 7. The total attendance for the eight schools the first day was 550. Within three days the enrollment had risen to 750, Perseverance school leading with 225. The supplies on hand were exhausted and additional ones ordered.

The Sunday School Board has appointed a colporteur to work among the Poles of Milwaukee. It is estimated that there are over 50,000 Poles in Milwaukee, and the language and exclusiveness of these people have been a barrier to missionary work heretofore. The special work attempted for the people in Milwaukee will be watched with interest by Racine, Oshkosh and other large cities where these interesting people have assembled.

South Dakota

Rev. H. M. Frank, who served most acceptably at Vale for two years, went to Texas to take up work under the board as Sabbath school missionary.

Rapid City church under the leadership of Rev. H. McClenehan is growing in numbers as well as in strength in every department of the church.

A sanitarium and hospital at Hot Springs under the auspices of the Synod of South Dakota is an enterprise now incorporated and fairly inaugurated under the leadership of the pastor of the church of Hot Springs, Rev. Dwight D. Tallman, who is granted leave of absence to secure funds in addition to the $15,000 of local contributors. This enterprise is encouraged by the Synods of Nebraska and Colorado. The nation has a million dollar sanitarium and the state has its soldiers' home there.

Minnesota

At an adjourned meeting of Mankato Presbytery at Worthington Rolland A. McNall was made licentiate.

The Ten Thousand and One at Los Angeles

Austria, Russia, Japan, China, Korea and India. The desire for a forward movement in mission lands crystallized itself in an offering of nearly $8,000 to the fund for the support of this work.

Institutes and conferences in connection with the convention, though numerous, were well attended and marked by an intense interest in the various subjects under discussion. The general subject of Bible study for personal growth and personal work was under the leadership of Dr. John Balcom Shaw, pastor-elect of Immanuel Presbyterian church of Los Angeles. Large crowds gathered daily in the auditorium of First Presbyterian church to take part in this institute, of which one of the most inspiring parts was the devotional exercises in which the delegates brought from the treasury of their memories the riches of gospel truth.

Dr. Charles M. Sheldon's institutes for pastors and Christian workers, of which the general topic was, "The Old Gospel at Work in a New World," was the most diversified. The range of discussion covered the whole field of social, civic, economic, educational and religious thought. Dr. Sheldon thinks that the church can no longer maintain a midweek prayer meeting, and should substitute for it some form of entertainment for recreation and diversion. Dramatic entertainments, whose moral and religious tone is positive and definite, were recommended; and the use of a modified form of the confessional was urged upon all pastors who would keep in close touch with their congregations. A dramatized form of the story "In His Steps" has been issued and presented in the church of which Dr. Sheldon was pastor by the members of the Christian Endeavor society. Many other churches have presented the play. The large demand of the delegates for copies of the play seemed to indicate a desire on the part of many to make a trial of this new departure in church entertainment. Great interest was also aroused in Dr. Sheldon's institute in the discussion of the subject of a great Christian daily newspaper.

Evangelistic fervor was not wanting in this great convention. Personal work for the saving of souls was a topic uppermost in discussion in conference, institute and upon the platforms of the great mass meetings. Many street meetings were held by visiting delegations and Christian workers in which the spiritual influence of the convention was brought directly to bear upon the pulsating life of the great city.

Billy Sunday Attracts Throngs

Evangelistic power obtained its most positive expression in the person and preaching of Rev. William A. Sunday. This simple preacher of the old time gospel has had titles tacked on to both ends of his name since his work began to attract general attention, but he is still Billy Sunday. The meetings addressed by Mr. Sunday were crowded to the doors and to the roof, and, wherever it was possible, overflow meetings were held. One of the newspapers had a daily sermon from his pen, and all of the papers gave full accounts of his utterances. No voice in all the convention sounded a clearer note of the old gospel call than his, and, judged by the impression made, no personality will have exerted a more lasting influence for good.

The most spectacular event of the convention was the parade of the delegates from Central park through the heart of the city to the auditorium. A squad of mounted policemen, heading the procession, was followed by the white-clad committee of 1913. Then came the delegation from northern California, and advance guard of the main body of delegates. The delegation from Illinois was next to California. Chicago had already captured the convention for 1915, and saw no reason to keep the matter secret. Kansas was there with a great sunflower and a song to match the decoration. Arizona and New Mexico were in line, and so were all the other forty-seven states and ~~territories represented~~, to say nothing of the Canadian provinces and the foreign countries, with their lanterns and brilliant banners. Bringing up the rear was the great delegation from southern California. Interspersed were bands of music. The line of march was through the principal streets of the city, which were lined on either side with thousands of interested spectators, to the auditorium, where the chorus of a thousand voices, aided by an orchestra and several soloists, gave a splendid concert. A more inspiring demonstration of youthful enthusiasm employed in a good cause could hardly be found anywhere.

In closing, the convention brought into intense focus the great ideas that had been in review through all the sessions. These ideas were crystallized in expressions of purpose to work them out wherever God might call his servants to serve. The dominant notes of the convention had brought conviction. The trend of service is in the direction of social and civic righteousness, the attainment of a condition of universal peace and good will among men, the abolition of the liquor traffic, the increase of strength and efficiency in their churches and in their own personal lives. Christian youth has set a high standard for itself. Tasks worthy the best efforts of the best of men await these soldiers of the cross. The vision is great because they have great faith in a great God.

School and College

The recent financial statement of Huron College shows that in order to pay other bills during the past year fifteen instructors were forced to loan the college from $50 to $300 each, which is due on their salaries. Completion of payments on the recently subscribed endowment has blocked channels of contribution usually available for current indebtedness.

Park College has recently issued a list of its graduates who are at work on the home and foreign mission fields. It gives the names of thirty-seven persons at work in home missions and seventy abroad, who are divided among eleven countries. In addition there is a large number who are at work in similar fields, but who did not complete the college course.

It has been decided by the directors of Montana College not to remove that institution from Deer Lodge to Great Falls. Last spring an offer was made by the latter city to donate $100,000 and a campus of forty acres. Citizens of Deer Lodge meanwhile have presented the board with subscriptions for $40,000 with a promise of $10,000 more by Aug. 1. Dr. J. N. Maclean of Missoula, who had been offered the presidency, has declined.

The summer school of Bellevue College, under the direction of Dean William E. Nicholl, is in progress with an increased attendance. The opening address was delivered by Dr. Alexander Corkey. The school closes Aug. 8. Rev. Charles E. Baskerville, vice-president of the college, is prosecuting the financial work during the summer. He is meeting with encouragement among the churches of the state and hopes to complete the $30,000 fund for current support by the opening of the college year. Rev. Frank Throw of Ottumwa, Iowa, will have charge of the department of physical training for the coming year. He is an alumnus of the college.

Rev. W. L. Darby, president of Cumberland College, Clarksville, Ark., represented that institution at the recent convention of the National Education Association at Salt Lake City.

The report of the Kennedy School of Missions maintained by the Hartford Seminary Foundation shows that students who have been trained in phonetics before going to mission fields have been able to make much more rapid progress than has been customary with newly appointed missionaries. It is expected that facilities for instruction in this department will be greatly enlarged.

Good Things in This Issue

The people of New York state are gradually becoming aware of a need of reform in their prison at Sing Sing. The recent investigation of this institution, undertaken in part by Inez Milholland, the suffragist leader of New York, has brought additional attention to long standing abuses there. The investigation is still in progress and gives added interest to the article in this week's Continent by Bruce Barton, "Good Fruit on Stony Ground." Those who have not followed the latest development in humanitarian methods of dealing with former inmates of penitentiaries and reformatories will find in this article some very interesting facts. Page 1022.

Dr. Francis E. Clark's article on page 1020 has an added timeliness on account of the recent Christian Endeavor convention at Los Angeles, which is reported in full on page 1017.

Fiction is always acceptable in the summer time, and Mrs. Elizabeth Price's story, "The Little Shopkeeper's Dress," page 1024, is one of the best short stories The Continent has printed for some time.

An excellent guide to the mass of new fiction which has appeared this summer will be found on pages 1030-1031. There are some books which you will not want to read. The Continent is as frank in warning you from these as it is in recommending those which it deems worthy of your perusal.

Modest Texas Pastor

First Baptist church, Dallas, Texas, is proud of its pastor, Dr. G. W. Truett. He has been in the city for sixteen years and is sought far and wide for evangelistic services. He has declined calls to other pastorates and at the same time has refused to let his church pay him more than a living salary. With every effort to advance his pay he has met his people with a refusal. But recently his congregation ran over their shepherd's protest and presented him with a new home costing $15,000. When almost forced to accept this expression of kindness and love he announced that he must do so with the fullest freedom. The church showed its fine spirit by telling him he should feel himself free to sell it the next day.

Dr. George D. Matthews Dies

The death of Rev. George D. Matthews, D. D., general secretary of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches Throughout the World Holding the Presbyterian System, occurred July 5. Dr. Matthews was 85 years old and was seriously weakened physically by his fidelity in the performance of his duties as secretary at the tenth council of the alliance, held at Aberdeen, Scotland, June 18 to 26. After the close of the council he went from Aberdeen to Edinburgh, was taken seriously ill on July 2 and passed away July 5. He was buried on July 9 in the churchyard of South Leith Parish church in a family grave.

The summer assembly at Collegeville, Pa., Aug. 1 to 7 presents a program of exceptional strength. Among the Presbyterians to be heard at this interdenominational conference are Dr. D. S. Kennedy, Dr. John Balcom Shaw and Rev. R. Howard Taylor. The daily Bible hour will be in charge of Dr. George Stibitz of Central Seminary, Dayton, Ohio.

Severance, Louis Henry—Remarks of Paul F. Sutphen, D. D., at the funeral services of the late Elder Louis H. Severance, Cleveland, Ohio, June 28.

"There is a striking story in the Old Testament of the death of Abner. When David the king heard the news he said to his servants, Know ye not that a prince and a great mn has fallen this day in Israel? These are the words which have been going through my mind the last few days. It would be unnecessary, even if it were fitting, to attempt to recapitulate the services which our beloved friend who has gone from us has rendered to the cause of humanity and the church of Christ. I would rather speak in these few moments of the princeliness of his character and the greatness of his soul. It has been my privilege to know him intimately for nearly thirty years, for seven as his pastor, and ever since as a warm personal friend. It was the Christian note which was the most distinctive in his personality. It is entirely within the truth to say that the interests of religion were the greatest interests in his life. These were inspired, no doubt, by his splendid Christian ancestry, the greatest heritage which any man can receive from the past. Those of us who have lived here many years have not forgotten that saintly woman, whose son he was, the memory of whose beautiful Christlike character lingers with us like the perfume of vanished flowers. And back of her was the Christian physician, the first physician this town had ever known, who had got his inspiration from that greatest of all physicians, who himself bore our sicknesses and carried healing in his touch. This was the Christian heritage of our friend, and in these times when so many who have had a similar heritage appear to despise it and cast it to the winds, even as Esau despised his birthright, it is well to remember that this friend of ours was true to the sacred ideals which he had received from those who went before him, and that he has transmitted this grand inheritance of faith in God to his children. The fact is worthy of special emphasis, because there was no channel of purely worldly living which was not open to him had he chosen to pursue it. The world was open to him as it is to only a few. If he chose another path it was not because he was ascetic, not because he did not enjoy to the full all the good things of this life, but because his moral and religious convictions made him regard all privilege as weighted with responsibility to God and his fellow men.

"It was quite in keeping with these convictions that his human sympathies should have been large and comprehensive. His personal interest in individuals was one of the most striking characteristics of his nature. He walled himself around with no barrier of social exclusiveness. It used to amaze me how he remembered the given names of boys and girls in his old Sunday school, after they had grown to manhood and womanhood, and with what genuine interest he watched their careers in life no matter how humble their origin nor how lowly their lot. These were his friends quite as much, if not more, than his associates in the business and social world with whom he was constantly in contact. There was in him a sort of democracy which made him interested in all sorts and conditions of men, little suspected perhaps by those who knew him only as a man of large affairs or who gained their impression of him from a certain dignity of manner which to superficial observers did not appear to invite too close an intimacy. How sincere was this personal interest in others has been testified to me scores of times by men and women whom he knew as boys and girls in years gone by, who found in him a kind friend and sympathizer as well as a substantial helper in time of need. They are among those whose hearts are saddened by the occasion which brings us together today.

"It is not given to every man, no matter how great his sympathies or how wide his opportunity, to have a world vision. Most of us, even the broadest, are more or less provincial in our outlook upon life. If we are sympathetic our sympathies are apt to be local; if Providence has given us opportunity we are apt to confine that opportunity within boundaries with which we are familiar. It is no exaggeration to say that our friend's sympathies were as wide as the world, and that he saw his opportunity wherever humanity is found. That is why Japan and Korea, China and India all lose today by his departure from us. In the Christian communities of those far-off lands his name is a household word, for not content with providing in a substantial manner for their betterment in body, mind and soul, his interest in them induced him to see them face to face and to study the problem of their need in the lands in which they dwell. It was a great vision, looking far beyond the little local boundary which confines the attention of most of us, and a great and princely heart which beat for the interests of the whole wide world in the far off lands of heathendom as well as in regions nearer home. So I revert to what I said in the beginning, the most distinctive note of our friend's life was the Christian note. He did not have much faith in philanthropic effort which is divorced from faith in God; he did not believe much in education which leaves religion out of the curriculum, he did not imagine that moral teaching would save society unless it is backed by the power of the Spirit of God. On these lines his life was lived —a great and princely life—as we see it today, for it was inspired by the greatest motive which can inspire any life, the sincere desire to serve one's day and generation according to the will of God.

"Now the laborer's task is o'er;
  Now the battle day is passed;
Now upon the farther shore
  Rests the voyager at last.
Father, in thy sacred keeping
Leave we now thy servant, sleeping.

"There the tears of earth are dried,
  There its hidden things are clear,
There the work of life is tried
  By a juster Judge than here.
Father, in thy sacred keeping
Leave we now thy servant, sleeping.

"Earth to earth and dust to dust—
  Calmly now the words we say;
Left behind we wait in trust
  For the resurrection day.
Father, in thy gracious keeping
Leave we now thy servant, sleeping."

"Money, Money Everywhere"

But Not a Cent for Salaries!

Huron College, during the past year and a half, has collected $439,885.12 for endowment, but not one cent of this money can be used in paying salaries. Next year the income from this entire amount will be available, but we must pay this year's salaries now.

On July 5th, after borrowing almost to the limit of our credit, we still owed the following balances on salaries:

No. 1	$250	No. 8	$100	No. 15	$ 300
No. 2	200	No. 9	150	No. 16	333
No. 3	200	No. 10	300	No. 17	100
No. 4	200	No. 11	200	No. 18	335
No. 5	50	No. 12	200	No. 19	225
No. 6	300	No. 13	100	No. 20	175
No. 7	300	No. 14	100	TOTAL,	$4,118

These salaries are not arranged in the order of rank. You can not guess them by referring to the catalogue. They range from $600 to $1,800 total salary for the year. The average is $1,096.

We have loans from banks and other obligations amounting to $11,764.59. The salaries should be paid first. Who will help us? Will you write indicating by number the salary you wish to pay?

Your College Chemistry—

Does It Help in Present Tasks?

A married woman in telling what college did for her, in next week's Continent, says that she can do her kitchen work under pressure with less confusion on account of her work in chemistry. This is but one of a number of prize letters from our readers in the

Educational Number, July 31

In addition to suggestions concerning college work from members of The Continent family there will be an article, "'Coming Back' to the Christian College," by Joseph Rogers Wilson. Young people who are thinking of attending college this fall will do well to study this carefully. "The Motive that Makes Men Ministers" is another interesting special article for this number by Dr. J. Beveridge Lee of Philadelphia, a close student of college men. Send this issue to young people planning to go to college. It may help them.

WHY NOT COMBINE THE ADVANTAGES OF HISTORIC BACKGROUND, A MODERN SCHOOL AND EXTREMELY MODERATE EXPENSE?

WASHINGTON AND JEFFERSON COLLEGE

The oldest institution of learning west of the Allegheny Mountains is keeping pace with modern development, and furnishing facilities for that broad and thorough education that fits young men to enter upon their technical or professional training. Its large faculty and well equipped laboratories enable the college to offer a variety of courses of study which make an education here both liberal and practical. Its courses of study are specially adapted to meet the needs of those who wish to prepare for a chosen life work without sacrificing the culture for which the traditional college education has long stood. A large portion of its alumni have entered the professions of Law, Medicine and Theology, wherein they have attained distinction. It is well for all ambitious young men to choose a college that has a history and a reputation.

Expenses are still more reasonable when compared with the cost at many universities, as no student need expend more than $350 a year at Washington and Jefferson. Student self-government has been tried successfully and promotes a moral atmosphere favorable to correct student conduct.

WILSON COLLEGE

FOR YOUNG WOMEN

CHAMBERSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA ANNA J. McKEAG, Ph.D., LL.D., President

For the young woman with a serious purpose to make her college course count to the utmost in knowledge, efficiency and character, Wilson College provides a curriculum in accord with the best standards. The faculty has been selected and is maintained with the purpose of affording the conscientious student a genuine college training that will give her diploma fullest value and equip her for a true woman's responsibilities in life. Facilities in keeping with a modern standard college are provided, and in every possible way the young woman's comfort and health are safeguarded.

The Faculty of Nearly 30 is well balanced, all the departments being under the direction of educators of special ability. The music department, headed by Professor O. A. Mansfield, Mus. Doc., F R.C.O., F A.G.O., L.Mus., is characterized by sincerity and effectiveness. The Art School is maintained with the same strict thoroughness. Both departments are conducted in harmony with the purposes of a standard college. We shall be pleased to furnish our descriptive catalogue to interested inquirers, and to answer specific questions. An early enrollment is desirable, if the student is to enter in September of 1913.

The religious element is a part of the college life, but no sectarian distinctions affect its patronage. Chambersburg is in the heart of the beautiful Cumberland Valley and is readily accessible from all sections. The college situation is elevated, the campus is spacious, and the commodious buildings are solidly and attractively constructed. We invite visits from parents whose daughters may now or later wish to enter college. The article on Wilson College in The Continent of May 15, 1913, which has attracted wide attention, gives the impressions of a visitor to the college.

Twelve Buildings: Main Hall (rooms for students, parlors, etc., and offices); Fletcher Hall (rooms for students); President's Hall (rooms for students); Dining Hall (capacity 325); Science Hall (laboratories and classrooms); Frank Thomson Hall (music department and auditorium, large pipe organ, practice pipe organs and pianos); Gymnasium (erected 1900); President's Residence, Infirmary, the "Cottage," and the Observatory. The library contains 12,000 volumes. The water supply cannot be excelled for purity. It comes from a forest reserve in the mountains, owned by the state, and rigidly protected from human habitation.

Being "Square" with Trust Funds

A College Problem Faced by Huron

Colleges when hard pressed have sometimes used endowment funds to pay debts. They call it "borrowing from themselves." That is a fiction. Endowment funds are trust funds. Trustees can properly use them only for the purpose for which they are given. Sometimes this makes the way harder, but it is the "square" way.

Huron College has $450,000 of endowment funds. But not all this money has yet begun to pay interest.

The College has $15,882 of debt not provided for. The endowment income, when available, will not reach back to pay these debts.

By helping to pay these debts who will help the College to stay honest?

By helping to clear away these debts who will help to put the College where it will not get into debt again?

Address, President of Huron College, Huron, South Dakota

A big subject for The Continent's family

The educational problem is a continuous one in The Continent's great family. For over forty years we have recognized that the choice of a preparatory school, college or other institution for the son or daughter is one of the most important issues that arise in the home. The Interior, and now The Continent, have sought consistently to keep the significance of this question before their readers, and to help them in their decisions. Men and women who were helped in this way are now planning for their own sons and daughters, and they turn to The Continent for an indication of which are the best schools, and which may most fully suit the individual needs of the student. Because of its consistent and conscientious emphasis upon the school question, and because of the high class of its constituency, the better schools have long recognized our paper as one of America's most efficient mediums in which to announce, with truthfulness and dignity, the provisions they make for education. Its constituency is almost 100 per cent interested. The Continent, therefore, has held and will maintain an unique position in its friendly relation to both schools and students.

This issue contains a great variety of helpful material for parents and students. Though your son or daughter may not yet be ready to enter, it will be infinitely worth while for you to study not only the articles but the school announcements. These announcements represent the best of our American institutions, which prepare for all walks of life, and in the range of costs can meet the varied possibilities of our great family. Start by studying the main facts of location and classification, then write to the school or schools in which you think you may be interested. They will be glad to give you full information. Begin early and do not decide hastily if you need not. Meanwhile, The Continent will continue to be helpful. If you are in doubt where to write, tell our Educational Bureau what your son or daughter needs and we will cooperate sympathetically with you.

Around the Shop

The Around-the-Shop Man and Mrs. A.-t.-S. began to plan their new home when they deposited their first $50 in the bank toward it. A simple matter it seemed at first, but how many imaginary partitions went up and came down in the years that followed! A composite photograph of all the plans made and unmade would realize the weirdest ambition of the most ardent cubist.

But there is something infinitely more important than the creation of a house, with its problem of available materials, of location, of arrangement and of cost. That is the sort of structure that shall be reared out of the soul and mind and body of your son or daughter. Yet many parents find themselves faced with an immediate crisis without having worked out a clear plan. Pity the student or parent who must decide hastily so important an issue!

During forty years, as The Interior, and for three years under a broader title, The Continent has urged early study of the boy's or girl's requirements. One can scarcely begin too early; easily one may begin too late. The Continent seeks to advertise only the good schools, and those which can best serve its particular constituency. Boys and girls whose parents selected their schools through the old Interior are now selecting schools for their own sons and daughters through the help of The Continent.

Though your children may not yet be ready for secondary school or college, begin now to study for their future if you have not done so. Write the schools for their catalogues and booklets and study them carefully and comparatively. Pick on some one school and get acquainted with it between now and the time your children enter. It is time well spent in the interest of one of the most important things in the world to you—a right preparation for life for your children.

BEST FACILITIES FOR MENTAL, MORAL AND PHYSICAL TRAINING. MODERATE EXPENSE

The Western College Choir

During its long career The Western College has made a contribution to American womanhood, which is the best evidence of the efficiency and sincerity of its work. Its students are proud of its past. But The Western seeks preeminently to meet the need of the young woman of today for a thorough college education under Christian auspices at moderate cost. It provides a capable faculty, trained in the leading universities and colleges; a curriculum meeting recognized college standards, and an equipment in buildings and facilities well adapted to the requirements of students and instructors. The Art, Music and Domestic Science Departments are strong and well equipped features. The Western is within easy reach of Cincinnati, and the pretty village of Oxford is near by; but the remarkable campus of 350 acres, spreading over hill and valley, gives complete detachment from undesirable distractions. Pure water, exceptional facilities for outdoor life—golf, tennis, skating, etc.; physical training under an exclusive director. Tables supplied from Western's own farm. The Christian home fellowship of the college family is characteristic. Expenses very moderate.

A new Gymnasium with ample space and equipment will be ready in September. It includes a large Swimming Pool.

Aphorisms of Education

EDUCATION is compulsory. No human being living from infancy up to mature life can escape it. Even after maturity one must be amazingly hard and stubborn to resist it. For youth anywhere the only possible question about education is not whether one shall receive it but whence it shall come and of what sort it shall be. Happy is the young man or woman whom circumstances permit to make choice of the mode and manner thereof.

Schools do not educate. At the very best they can only guide, counsel and inspire the student to avail himself profitably of the educating experience which life forces upon him.

Life first brings its education to bear on the child in the home. The home therefore is the greatest of all educational institutions. The school cancels the influence of the home only in rare and exceptional instances; it never can supply what the home should give if the home comes short of its obligation.

The Bible is precise psychologically and pedagogically when it says: "The fear of Jehovah is the beginning of wisdom." Education is the process of forming in the mind of youth a just understanding of life; its proper result is to create harmony between the life which a man lives and the great facts of things as they are. And that harmony is never perfect except it begins with the first fact of all facts—that God lives and requires right doing from all his creatures. Education which does not include this consciousness is inevitably and always defective. As science would say, it ignores essential data.

Knowing is not the end of education. Nothing can be more dismal than teaching where either the teacher or the pupils imagine that what they are trying to do is to learn things out of a book. The aim to learn things by experiment is only a whit better. The end of all competent educational means is neither knowing nor doing, but being—the achievement of a character that marks up even with the best of one's possibilities.

The value of knowledge in relation to education is the value of knowing one's self and one's surroundings. Apart from the happy constraint of external influences which compel us often to do better than we can comprehend, the right adjustment of our lives depends on how well we understand ourselves and how well we understand the universe in which we live. As between two men whose purpose and will are equal, that man lives best who knows the most of the world. Such is the fashion in which knowledge aids character.

If a well schooled man is not a good man, it is a manifest sign that his education has not been good. This may be because his teachers were incompetent, not perceiving that education ought to be for character rather than knowledge; or it may be because the world's many baser agencies of education have worked in and overcome the influence of his teachers. But in either case, the evil man of education is self-evidently not well enough educated to appreciate the fact that the universe works to conserve righteousness and to eliminate unrighteousness; moreover, that it includes and affords power enough to enable any man to keep on the side of righteousness and thus have his life conserved.

Materialism can result from a course in the schools only when the course has been but half adequate to the facts—as if a student had been taught physics and had learned nothing of chemistry, or had been instructed in mathematics and told nothing of history. Such a man might argue that atomic weights are a fiction or sneer at the progress of human liberty as a vain dream, but his ignorance would not impeach the value of schooling in the large; it would simply expose the insufficiency of his schooling. So with the man who comes from school unconscious of the pervasion of the material world by a creative and life-sustaining Spirit.

The profound fault of modern educational thinking is the common assumption that the whole is no more than the sum of the parts. A student is afforded instruction in the various branches of an approved college curriculum and it is then supposed that he has obtained an education. But he has not. The vital element of education has nowhere been touched. That vital requirement is some principle of living which will draw all the student's knowledge and experience into concerted relation and make of the whole a base to stand on among men. And customarily the college pays no direct attention to that need. Every instructor is busy about his own special part of the course of study, and nobody expounds the bearing of the course entire.

Inspiration, from the standpoint of college management, is usually considered an incidental function too ethereal to be definitely provided for by any act of the governing authorities. All that trustees and president distinctly undertake is to provide instruction, and if along with the teaching power of those employed for instruction there should go any element of enlivening contagion of great ideals, the circumstance is regarded as only a happy accident. When larger wisdom has penetrated the counsels of college and university authorities, the maintenance of a faculty of well observed inspirational quality, habitually radiating the loftiest conceptions of the meaning of life, will be deemed the first obligation of their trust.

The noblest work of education is a man or woman who fears God and understands that God has made opportunity and advantage not an asset for self but a debt to others.

"Graduation" means advancing to a new grade. Its use in regard to schooling is as happy as the term "commencement." Both ought to be reclaimed from nominal to essential meaning, for both suggest that no one leaves a school of grade so advanced that there is not another grade of learning beyond. Even death itself is but graduation into a greater training and discipline beyond.

If God will but give us life, now and hereafter, as fully as we can receive it, the highest education will be ours. And real education is open only to those who above all else want to live in reality —live for the utmost in themselves and in their fellows.

The World

Civil Strife in China; Dr. Sun Against Yuan

China's internal war—like the American conflict of a half century ago pitting South against North—spread last week, until it had involved seven of the southern provinces, with hard fighting reported from many parts of the country. Kwantung province, of which Canton is the capital, proclaimed its secession, and other provinces of the south came to an agreement for joint action against President Yuan Shih Kai. A force of 10,000 irregular troops left Canton to give battle to the northern army, and the insurgents declared their determination to end Yuan's "despotism." Most important was the fact that Dr. Sun Yat Sen, the famous leader who overthrew the Manchu dynasty and later withdrew in favor of Yuan, seems to have cast his lot with the revolt. The first revolution originated in the south in the old capital of Nanking, and self-government was forced upon the northern people. Yuan, who was of the old school, was accepted as a compromise president, both probational and provisional, and he has evinced little sympathy with republican ideas, though he has displayed remarkable ability and strength. In Mongolia and Tibet he suffered reverses which impaired his influence, and his management of the five-power loan alienated a large part of the Chinese parliament. Then came the assassination of leaders who were unfriendly to him under circumstances not yet fully explained.

Manifestoes were issued by both President Yuan and Dr. Sun. Dr. Sun asserts that "just resistance to intolerable tyranny is no rebellion." To Yuan he says: I am determined to oppose you as firmly as I did the Manchus. Retirement is absolutely your only course in the face of the present crisis." The merchants and the conservative classes have not joined in the revolt, and the regular army and navy have been standing loyal to President Yuan. The president's proclamation denounced by name three of the revolutionary leaders, not including Dr. Sun, and offered rewards for their capture or death. Apparently there is little chance of the military success of the revolt. At Shanghai and other points the rebels were repulsed.

Marines from the American fleet in Asiatic waters commanded by Admiral Nicholson were landed to help protect Americans and other foreigners.

President Wilson and Anarchy in Mexico

"What shall the United States do about Mexico?" is the first question asked a few days ago in a prominent weekly magazine. An equally prominent daily newspaper editor replies, "Trust the President," adding that the President is better informed as to all factors of the situation than any editor or politician. With knowledge he conjoins power, responsibility and patriotism, and the nation reposes confidence in his coolness and good judgment.

The United States took high moral ground in refusing to recognize the Huerta government because it had been established on a foundation of treachery and assassination. Thus Huerta's hatred was earned. However, during the interim since President Madero's murder the rebels, or constitutionalists, have not had even a de facto government with which President Wilson could deal. At the same time an act of Congress prevented Americans from selling arms and ammunition to the so-called rebels, but the latter were well supplied from some mysterious source. Rebel prestige has risen as a result of America's nonrecognition of Huerta, and the federalists have lost several small, though not unimportant, battles. American property, trade and citizens in Mexico have suffered from both sides and from the condition of anarchy which widely prevails. The New York Sun prints a map showing four states in Northern Mexico in possession of the rebel general, Carranza, a dozen more supposedly under control of the Huerta administration and the remainder of the country in anarchy.

Recognition of Huerta by Great Britain and other foreign nations has apparently made opposition to him more fierce by those leaders who regard him as a usurper.

President Wilson has asked John E. Lamb of Indiana to mediate between the Mexican factions with a view of restoring peace and preventing European intervention, which has lately been strongly hinted at. Mr. Lamb, it is reported, may later succeed H. L. Wilson as ambassador at Mexico City. The plan announced last week was for Mr. Lamb to call upon President Huerta and General Carranza and some of the other factionists and urge them to agree to the cessation of hostilities and the holding of a fair election, followed by an immediate and peaceful installation of the victor into office. A fair election, by the way, would be a novelty in Mexico, and the idea has not been very cordially received south of the Rio Grande as yet. Just how far Uncle Sam will go in forcing this friendly settlement has not been disclosed, but the course proposed is regarded by many members of Congress as both practicable and sensible.

Ambassador Wilson, on his arrival in New York last Friday, resented any criticism of his course in consorting with Huerta and Felix Diaz, and, according to newspaper reports, briefly branded the suggestion of mediation as "all rot"—this in advance of his conference with President Wilson. The latter also received independent reports on the situation from two special investigators—Messrs. Del Valle and Hale.

Washington Protests Shooting of Official by Mexicans

A United States immigration inspector, Charles B. Dixon, was shot and seriously wounded by Mexican federal soldiers at Juarez on Saturday. Mr. Dixon had gone to Juarez to investigate a case of white slavery implicating one Arthur Walker, a negro, and through Walker's influence a squad of soldiers was sent to arrest the immigration inspector, whose character and mission may not have been known to the Mexican authorities. But instead of being taken to military or police headquarters Mr. Dixon says he was marched toward the suburbs and to what he feared would be a summary execution. Thereupon he attempted to escape and was shot in the back as he fled.

Prompt protests were made by American Consul Edwards and by Mr. O'Shaughnessy, in charge of the embassy at Mexico City, with demands reenforced from Washington for the immediate release of the inspector and the punishment of his assailants. After some delay the inspector was transferred to American soil and the persons directly concerned were placed under arrest. Diplomatic apologies were expected, but the effect of the incident at this critical time was generally regarded as most unfortunate.

The state department also demanded the release of two mine managers—Messrs. Bissell and McDonald—held by federal soldiers at Chihuahua and threatened with execution.

Fight for Balance of Power in Balkan Peninsula

If the theater of war were larger or the combatants of greater numerical strength the second Balkan war would have attracted and held the world's constant attention. It is a mistake, however, to regard the conflict as a petty squabble over territorial spoils, for the underlying issues and possibilities are momentous. The balance of power in the Balkan peninsula is at stake, a readjustment of the relations between the triple alliance and the triple entente is in progress, and the map of Southeastern Europe will show soon another kaleidescopic change. The despised Turk has suddenly and strongly revived and the now energetic Roumania has apparently forsaken Austria and the triple alliance in favor of Russia and the triple entente and has invaded Bulgaria. The latter country has found itself involuntarily transformed from a despoiler into the despoiled, as Turkey, Roumania, Greece and Servia have been helping themselves at Bulgaria's expense and without regard to King Ferdinand's protests.

Turkey's reoccupation of Adrianople and Austrian, Italian and Russian jealousies at one time threatened to bring on a general war, but the present meek mood of Bulgaria makes the peace outlook again hopeful. The Russian government appears to be in earnest in insisting upon peace, and what Russia really wants she usually obtains.

Austria came to Bulgaria's relief last Friday, when the Austrian representatives at Belgrade and Athens officially demanded that hostilities cease at once, with a warning that Austria would not allow Bulgaria to be "too greatly humiliated."

Women Suffragists Gather in Washington

Representative women suffrage workers from New York and elsewhere planned to present to Congress today, July 31, petitions for national action in behalf of ballots for women. "Pilgrims" are expected from all points of the compass, the journeys to be made by automobiles, with stops for meetings and propaganda work en route. At the capital a banquet will be given, which several members of Congress have promised to attend.

A conference will be held in Washington August 13-15 by women from the nine states where they already have the right to vote—Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Oregon, Utah, Washington and Wyoming. Illinois, where women now have the right to vote as far as the state constitution will allow, may also be granted admission to the conference, which is under the auspices of the National Council of Women Voters. Ways and means of extending equal suffrage into other states of the union will be considered in executive sessions.

Chicago's Woman Superintendent Indorsed

More than local interest attaches to the resignation of Mrs. Ella Flagg Young as superintendent of Chicago schools, which was presented one week ago. Mrs. Young was at one time president of the National Education Association, and has been connected with the schools of Chicago for more than fifty years. She rose gradually and steadily until she was appointed head of the system four years ago at a salary of $10,000 per annum, said to be the largest salary paid any woman in public office in the world. She succeeded a long line of masculine predecessors, and she has gained recognition as a skilled and progressive educator. Under her administration plans have been worked out to bring the school system nearer the people; she has harmonized or adjusted political and religious factions among the thousands of teachers under her, and she has lifted the schools to a higher plane than she found them. Neither sex nor advancing years handicapped her.

Women of Chicago, who are proud of Mrs. Young's advancement, were roused to sharp protest by statements that her resignation had been forced by partisan or selfish considerations prevailing among members of the board of education. Mrs. Young's numerous women admirers arose in wrath and with one voice demanded that she recall her resignation and also that she be freed from any and all sinister interference from board members. A large mass meeting to this end was proposed. In the face of this extremely complimentary pressure Mrs. Young hinted that she would reconsider her withdrawal, and the hope was expressed that she would continue, so long as her health permits, to be the executive head of the public school system of the second city on the continent.

Tammany Influence Blamed for Fire Horror

Fifty persons, most of them young girl employees, lost their lives in a fire in the Freeman overall factory at Binghamton, New York, last week. Several causes contributed to bring about the shocking catastrophe, one of them being that fire drills had been so frequent in the factory that the employees paid only perfunctory attention when the alarm was sounded and were slow in responding to it. The fire escapes proved inadequate, and the stairway could not be used, as the fire started at that point and spread with startling rapidity. The women who were not burned to death were killed or injured in jumping from the upper windows of the building, which is asserted to have been of unsubstantial construction.

Governor Sulzer of New York issued a statement attributing the fire to the demoralized condition of the state labor department, which for some time past has been without a head. "The department is so tied up that it cannot execute the laws on the statute books to prevent these tragedies," said the governor. For this condition he blamed Charles F. Murphy, the political leader of Tammany hall, who is reputed to have prevented the confirmation of two different appointees of the governor to the office of labor commissioner.

An investigation of the circumstances surrounding the fire, which was similar in many respects to the fatal Triangle Shirtwaist fire in New York City in 1911, has been begun by state and local authorities, with a view to fixing responsibility for the disaster and discovering ways for guarding against a recurrence.

Michigan Copper Miners in Strike Riots

A bitter strike, attended by rioting and violence, broke out among the copper miners in the far northern part of the northern peninsula of Michigan last week, where the famous Calumet and Hecla and other mines are situated. The sheriff and his deputies at Calumet were overpowered, and all the available militia in the state were hurried to the scene as fast as geographical and transportation difficulties would permit. A state that is cut in two by a great lake is not well adapted for quick military maneuvers. There were, however, sufficient national guardsmen in the upper peninsula to quell the rioting before the situation became desperate.

Over 25,000 men were thrown out of work by the strike, which was originated by the Western Federation of Miners. The federation sent a request to all the mining companies for a conference, but the labor leaders say this request was ignored, and the strike followed. Demands of the men are for an eight hour day, abolition of the "one-man" drill and an increase in wages. In Montana and in Arizona it is claimed that the underground men receive $3.50 and $3.75 a day, as against $2 and $2.25 paid in the Calumet district for a longer working day. Governor Ferris was asked by the labor leaders to mediate, but he was not inclined to accept the invitation.

Justice Once Again Fails in Korea

The high hopes for justice to Baron Yun Chi Ho and his five Korean compatriots raised when Supreme Judge Watanabe reversed their conviction by the court of appeals are unhappily not realized in the second decision of the latter court, following the retrial which Judge Watanabe ordered. The finding of the supreme justice observed that the defendants had been convicted of conspiracy to assassinate the governor general without proof of any overt act aiming to carry the conspiracy into effect, and the offense charged in the indictment, he held, was not legally established until proof of some such active effort was presented. On this ground the verdict of guilty in the courts below was vacated and a new trial required.

All this appeared to offer the persecuted baron and his fellow prisoners an excellent assurance of liberty, for the government had already exhausted the utmost effort to incriminate the defendants. Moreover in effect, if not explicitly, Judge Watanabe had repudiated the alleged confessions of the prisoners on which the prosecution had chiefly relied. Under these circumstances it looked as if the machinations of the Japanese police, who have sought so persistently to terrorize the Koreans, were doomed to entire frustration, as frustration had already met them in so large part. But the resources of official malice seem to have proved unfortunately equal to the occasion. Somehow, in a way which the brief news cables do not explain, the police have been able to make a show of new evidence, and the court of appeals, dominated by police and military authorities, hand down a second verdict alleging that the prisoners did take open measures to consummate the assassination by sending agents through Korea to enlist assassins. On this claim the six defendants are again sentenced to six years' imprisonment. But hope still remains that Judge Watanabe as final arbiter will once more tear up the web of falsehood.

A Panorama of the Sunday School World

BY LOYAL W. MADDEN

MORE THAN 2,500 delegates assembled in the world's seventh Sunday school convention at Zurich July 8-15, representing every country and people of the globe. Zurich proved to be an ideal place for such a gathering. Nature has given the country almost more than mortal mind could picture. The work of Zwingli made it a mountain peak in the pages of history.

Bishop John H. Vincent led the great opening praise service, and hearts were moved and eyes filled with tears of joy and gratitude as the choruses rang out. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, Philadelphia, became the convention pastor. He sounded the keynote of soul winning and the winning of the world in loving the young and teaching them the Book or books with hope, joy and purpose.

The first evening the large Tonhalle was jammed with delegates and citizens to take part in the welcome service. Mayor Robert Billefer, Pastor Arnold Ruegg and Bishop John L. Nuelsen, representing the city, the local committee and continental Europe, spoke with great cheer and from strong hearts. Men representing various different nations made happy responses. The consuls of the United States, Great Britain and Germany were introduced.

Survey of World's Mission Fields

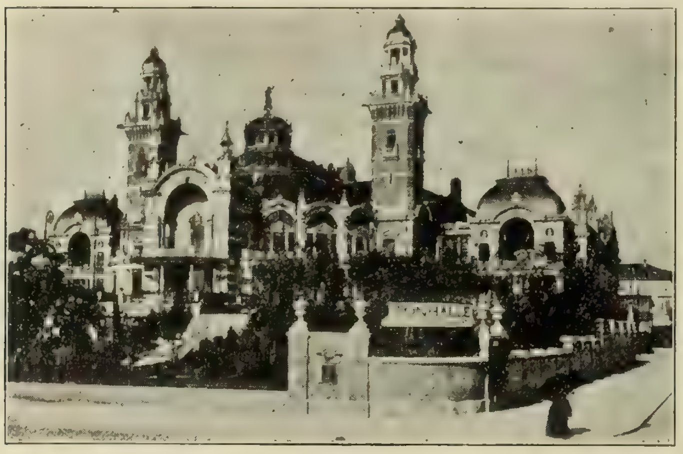
Soon after the Washington convention three years ago six commissions were appointed by the world executive committee to make a survey of the mission fields of the world as to the conditions and needs and report at this convention. Much time, money and travel were expended to visit and see personally the conditions and bring the exact facts. H. J. Heinz of Pittsburg, with a company of Sunday school experts and business men and their families, made a tour of the world and visited the leading fields and viewed the work from a business man's standpoint. Their findings were heard with much interest. The company was profoundly moved by the need for more workers and stronger finances.

The different commissions presented the opportunities and asked salaries to place secretaries in the fields. In some instances, before the speaker had finished, persons in the audience sent up checks to cover the amount asked, for the interest was so intense that men were moved to supply the need at once. This convention brought the opportunity which the ages have labored to prepare.

Crowded Conferences: Speakers from All Quarters

More than 250 different speakers from every country on the face of the globe spoke on the world's Sunday school problems. The afternoons were given over to conferences on the many different phases of work. Six conferences each afternoon were held in the largest church auditoriums, and many times standing room was at a premium.

The missionary influence became very strong as appeal after appeal was made for prayer, money and for young lives to be placed upon the altar. There were 250 missionaries present from the world's mission fields. The convention reached high tide on Saturday morning, when $175,000 was asked to carry on the activities of the next three years. In a remarkably short time nearly the whole sum was pledged. The American section assumed responsibility for $100,000 and the British section assumed the remainder.



Tonhalle, Zurich, Switzerland, Where Main Meetings of World's Sunday School Convention Were Held

Two high officials from Japan, coming on purpose, presented an invitation for the next convention to be held at Tokyo, which was duly accepted after much favorable consideration for other cities sending invitations. Thus the word now is "On to Tokyo in 1916."

Sir Robert Laidlaw of London was elected president, Frank L. Brown of New York was elected president of the executive committee, Marion Lawrance of Chicago was elected secretary of the American section and Rev. Carey Bonner of London was elected secretary of the British section.

Sunday afternoon in the Tonhalle a great temperance meeting was held, the echo of which will reach the utmost parts of the globe. Miss Marie Brehm of Pennsylvania delivered a remarkable address on "Temperance and Christian Citizenship." The audience was large and enthusiastic.

Dr. F. B. Meyer of London led the morning devotional hour each day. He made deep and lasting impressions with the spiritual way that he used each scriptural instance, making it stand out and then applying it to practical life, and then making the appeal to let the Holy Spirit take complete control of the life and use it for the glory of God.

Broadening Opportunities for Mission Work

The last days were crowded full of the very best. The convention was made to feel that the mission field is ripe unto the harvest and that through the Sunday school the work must be done. The impact upon the East is wonderful. Young men and women of the Mohammedan lands are crying to enter the mission schools, hungering for education. With the young republic of China come new needs, while Japan is thirsting and Korea is coming as in a great revival.

Men are seeing attractive openings for investing money and lives, and the Sunday school is to furnish the training, the workers and the baptism of the Holy Ghost.

A Preacher to Boys

IT IS A CURIOUS fact that while all men have been boys, only a few men seem to understand a boy. It is even notable when a man is capable of successful preaching to boys. No one would ever suppose in theory that the knowledge of one's boyhood could be so completely lost as it actually is, but Sunday school superintendents the country over could testify out of painful experience how few men have kept, or have found, the knack of speaking to boys.

Perhaps that has come in part from lack of a sense of the importance of it. Many men in forgetting their boyhood have minimized the impressions which were made on them at that time. They are dealing so much more with men that they feel the larger importance of mature life. As a matter of fact, everybody knows, when he stops to think of it, that a boy is by all odds more important than a man, and that the ability to present religion to boys is more valuable than the ability to present religion to men.

About three years ago educational people were interested to observe the call of Rev. William Temple, then connected with the Student Christian Union of Australia, to the old Repton Boys' School in England. Mr. Temple is one of the men who is courageous in speaking of religion to boys. There has recently been published a volume of his sermons, which he has preached in the school chapel in the past two years, whose preface gives some hint of the principles which have guided him.

We think that Continent readers will be interested to learn his "personal convictions concerning school boys and their religious life." These convictions are three, as he sums them up. The first is that "boys, like other people, can understand a great deal more than they get credit for." They do not think out great things perhaps, but they find little difficulty and great pleasure in following out a train of ideas under someone else's guidance. They may not usually be able to reproduce what is said. Certainly if they did, it would be in unusual language. Meanwhile, however, they are never to be preached down to, because they are more sensitive than adults are to the effort to moderate one's speech in their behalf.

Mr. Temple's second conviction is that "most boys at the public school age have a strongly mystical tendency." That is because of the great emotional development which is characteristic of that period of life. Here also boys are much misunderstood, because they are so unwilling, even unable, to give any verbal expression of this mystical feeling. The words they are accustomed to use in common speech seem out of place in this connection. "No one would try to talk about communion with God, or home affection, or any other sacred and intimate thing, if he could use no other terms of approbation except 'top hole' and the like, without feeling a fool." Most of us who have been boys know what he means. We felt strongly, but we would not have allowed anyone to know it for the world. Mr. Temple's great appeal manifestly is to that tendency, for whose expression he pleads in the way that is suitable in a boy's life. The texts, the themes and the content of his sermons are such as indicate his daring appeal to the mystical in boys.

But his third conviction is even more pertinent to men who want to preach to boys: "The most conspicuous good quality in boys is generosity, and the ideal presented to them, therefore, should be the highest and the most exacting." "It is middle age, not youth, which is likely to be alienated by a religion which demands big sacrifices." The point of that for most of us would be, that we ought not to present to boys a petty religion. We notice Mr. Temple preaching on "Christ the Hero," and on "The Severity of Christ," and on "The Divine Judgment," and on "The Dedication of Strength." These are unusual themes for sermons to boys, but he is persistently fighting the bad psychology which suggests that you must not demand too much. He insists that the only period in life when there is no danger of demanding too much is in boyhood.

The sermons to which we have referred, which Mr. Temple simply calls "Repton School Sermons," are for the most part illustrative of these personal convictions. We are referring to them not so much to commend the sermons as to urge upon our ministerial readers the old duty of preaching to boys, of preaching without fear, without minimizing the claims of the gospel, and with a great assurance that in a boy there are unexpressed feelings which will be quickly aroused by the right appeal in behalf of Christ and the Christian life.

National Examples of Peril of Success

There have been two pathetic examples in international events these last few weeks of that strange weakness in the human constitution—personal, social or national—which makes success the most fatal of perils to which life exposes mankind. Bulgaria achieved a monumental victory over Turkey, but found in its triumph only an open doorway to a folly which now reduces it to pitiable humiliation. China was gloriously strong enough to replace an immemorial tyranny with a democratic regime dedicated to the popular welfare, but it is not strong enough to make that achievement redound to the purposes of it. Instead the success at which the world wondered becomes the occasion of a fratricidal war that promises to shatter China to fragments and utter wreck. How well it is written: "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." The corollary is, "Let him who succeedeth beware of calamity."

Racetrack Gambling Is Sneaking Back

Two years ago there seemed to be a fair prospect that racetrack gambling might be entirely eliminated from the United States. Public opinion was so far aroused against the evil and in support of its official suppressors that in New York, Louisiana, California, New Jersey and Illinois, leading centers for the miscalled "sport," the tracks were forced into disuse. But there are now signs that the gambling gentry have renewed their courage. In New York the Belmont track is again in operation; in Indiana a cheap affair is being conducted mainly to furnish betting odds, and at Windsor and Montreal in Canada the tracks have never been suppressed.

No one informed regarding the character of racing operations can be made to believe for an instant that the tracks would be maintained without the adjunct of betting. Though the gambling on the ground may be so conducted as to satisfy the dull consciences of weak governors and county officials, the information that is sent forth before and after the events keeps alive hundreds of city poolrooms and gives working material for thousands of "handbook" makers who solicit wagers in saloons, billiard rooms, barber shops and other places frequented by men and boys. The extent to which this sort of gambling is carried on depends upon the complaisance of the authorities in various cities.

Racing of this sort thrives upon gambling, but the gambling to be made profitable under present conditions must be connected with the information privileges—"entries and odds"—that go forth to a thousand cities. This information is disseminated by the newspapers and the telegraph companies. Some newspapers have never offended in this particular; others have mended their ways; but most of the big city dailies continue to print information which can have no other value than that of promoting gambling. And the agency of transmission to the newspapers and to the poolrooms is almost exclusively the telegraph company. Until the publication and dissemination of information to be used in gambling is prohibited by law, there is no likelihood that racetrack gambling will be stopped so long as anyone within reach of telegraph can whip a few spavined horses around a ring. If Christian people have any influence with lawmakers and newspapers and telegraph companies, a responsibility lies on them that cannot be ignored.

Half-Million for Brooklyn Association Work

Will these Young Men's Christian Association leaders kindly pass around a little of the charm which they use to catch so many large gifts? Every number of Association Men gives us a page or more of building notes which tell of movements for doing great things for the association. And here comes the announcement of a gift of $500,000 for the central branch of the association in Brooklyn! With it is to be erected the largest, best equipped, most up-to-date building in the world, with accommodations for more than 500 young men, in a new and most desirable location. The gift involves the securing of a somewhat smaller sum for purchase of ground. It is said to be the largest gift ever made to a single branch. The donor is Mrs. William Van Rensselaer Smith, a member of First Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, of which Dr. L. Mason Clarke is pastor, and there is in it a new revelation of mother love, for it commemorates her son and carries out part of his own wish in helping young men. The splendid gift was made through the general secretary of the Brooklyn association, John W. Cook, an elder in Lafayette Avenue church.

—The record of atrocities in the new Bulgarian campaign seems almost incredible. Unfortunately it seems only too well confirmed. The statements which have appeared in reliable newspapers of recent dates can hardly be refuted. Murder, rapine, robbery, all beyond the supposed justifications of war, are definitely charged. Women were burned alive, a hundred in one place, according to the record. More than 2,000 Jewish houses were destroyed in one city, wantonly and needlessly. And it all began with such heroism, with such daring in behalf of liberty, that the Christian world looked with a sad hope to see some good come from it. Is it not time to realize that it is not so that the kingdom comes? One of our contemporaries remarks that the chief characteristic of war is that it breeds war. It is a wise observation. This terrible story ought to be one of the final chapters in the history of war. But the only hope of its proving so is the spread of the spirit of Christ among men who bear his name.

—We do not know how far to credit the double report which comes from Paris that a well known fugitive negro prize fighter claims to have a copy of every book written about Napoleon, who is his hero, and that he has read all the writings of Dumas. It is altogether possible that the report is correct. If so, what a revelation it is of the miscarriage of admiration! Minute students might perhaps work out the subtle connection between the ambitious self-assertion of Napoleon, the strange imaginings of Dumas and the perverted aspirations of the pugilist. Most of us will have to satisfy ourselves with observing how difficult it is to use our hero worship to the best advantage. We may be able to add a thought of the unsuspected feelings of men whose habits of life make them seem only brutish and coarse. It takes something more than most pugilists reveal to admire even Napoleon and Dumas.

—In this summer season a class of people to whom the Christian beauty of the golden rule may be specially commended for observation and practice are the treasurers of benevolent funds in the local congregations. To apply this law of gold, let them imagine themselves responsible officers of the denomination's great mission boards. Then let them think how they would feel in such positions if themselves obliged to borrow funds at high interest while knowing that money destined for their needs meantime lies idle in local treasuries just because men who ought to have attended to the duty have neglected to remit. Is it not plain that exasperation would seem mightily excusable in such a case? And will not these reflections prompt hasty remittance from any local treasurer who gives them consideration?

—W. R. Stirling of Chicago, a prominent Episcopalian layman, has been active in strengthening and expanding the organization in support of Dr. Grenfell's remarkable Labrador work. Following a recent visit to the Labrador on a vessel chartered by himself, Mr. Stirling expressed himself enthusiastically regarding the existing work and the business methods governing its conduct. Dr. Grenfell's extensive journeys to remote regions sometimes put him out of mail communication for long periods. A short time ago he found nine weeks' accumulation of letters awaiting him on his return, and in the collection was a missive nine years old that had been mislaid somewhere. The letter may have been out of date, but the $30 contribution it contained had lost none of its usefulness.

—The love of outdoors is a sanative element in the constitution of any life. It is next to impossible for the sourest disposition to be crabbed outdoors; at least, the dourest of men are a shade less dour in the open air than under cover. A storm never looks so severe to the wayfarer who is out in the weather as to the stay-at-home who watches it through the window. The out-of-doors man or woman is bound to take a larger, happier, more cheery view of life than one who mopes in the house. There are few attacks of melancholy which will not yield to the universal prescription: Get into the open air.

—And so Dr. Cadman has declined the overtures of Second church, Chicago. He says it was hard to decide. We do not wonder. Second church will give some man a great chance. Its pulpit is a high one and a voice there can be heard throughout the Middle West as well as throughout the denomination. But the place of Dr. Cadman in Brooklyn and in the Congregational Church is a very important and attractive one. It is known on the inside that many of the men who are so persistently working toward a university for Brooklyn, which will serve all Long island, have their hopes set on Dr. Cadman.

—An eternally calm ocean would be a frightfully stupid and uninteresting feature of geography. Nobody would travel far to see such a phenomenon for the beauty or thrill of it. But it's an ennobling education in the grandeur of the creation of God to watch the throbbing breakers of a stormy sea roll thundering on a beach. So a calm life, though it might be agreeable, could scarcely be grand. It is only the life that is stirred by the throb of some mighty question which evinces sublimity.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

Putting Off the Old Man

WHAT IS THIS "old man," this "old nature" to which St. Paul refers? Paul describes it in its three great characteristics as though he were describing the three stages of some malignant disease, which begins in languor, passes on to drowsiness and ends in delirium.

Paul says that the old nature, the old man, in its mildest form, reveals itself as "vanity of mind." Let us not regard that phrase as being merely an equivalent to pride. We too often limit the meaning of the phrase to denote pride about one's personal appearance or personal possessions. But it has a much deeper and wider application. Vanity of mind means nothingness of thinking—thinking which just skims the surface and arrives at no truth. A vain mind is one that mistakes shadows for substances, semblances for realities, phantoms for facts. A vain mind is one that dwells so much in appearances as to believe that appearances are everything, and so is self-deceived.

Not All Vanity Consists in the Prides of Life

If some proud, haughty, lavishly dressed woman were to come strutting down the aisle of the church, wearing conspicuous jewelry, giving but a supercilious, condescending regard to all others, we should all agree in describing her as a vain woman. But there are some of us, who are not haughty, and who are not lavishly dressed, who bowed our heads tonight to pray, but we never prayed! It was only an appearance! And the recording angel has said of us what he said of the strutting woman—vain believer in mere appearances! We can masquerade before God as well as before men, and I for one would prefer the woman who masquerades in dress to the woman who does it in prayer.

Men can appear unto men to pray, and come to believe that that is a genuine prayer. That was the very essence of Pharisaism. A Pharisee had come to believe that to appear to pray was to pray. He mistook the shadow for the substance, and that is vanity of mind. And that is the continual peril of our life. Our religious thinking is apt to skim the surface of things, and not make piercing, probing, eager inquisition.

How many thousands and tens of thousands of people confess themselves to be "miserable sinners," and how many of them say it as lightly and merrily as though they were singing a ballad! It is nothingness of thinking, vanity of mind, a mere pretense! We take up big, general words, pointless and indefinite, and we dwell in the thinness of their breadth, and they never disturb our peace! We cannot understand the grief and the despondency and wretchedness of the old saints, simply because we do not follow the searching honesty of their thought. Our thinking dwells on the surface; their thinking went down into their hearts like the shaft of a pit.

Real Knowledge of Self Makes Men Humble

And listen how they speak of themselves. Here is John Bunyan: "I was more loathsome in mine own eyes than a toad, and I thought I was so in God's eyes, too. I could have changed heart with anybody. I thought none but the devil himself could equal me for inwardness and pollution of mind." Here is Oliver Cromwell: "I am the poorest wretch that lives; no poor creature hath more cause to put himself forth before God." Here is Isaac Watts: "A guilty, poor and helpless worm, on thy kind arms I fall." Here is Charles Wesley: "Impotent, dumb and deaf and blind and sick and poor am I." And here is the Apostle Paul: "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief."

We call such speech exaggerated and unreal. Unreal! Nay, we are in the unreal; we are among the shadows. These men had looked in upon their own hearts, and in the presence of their God had done some honest thinking, and called things by the right names. They had brought the unclean things out into the light and named them! The prayers and diaries of these men are long catalogues of unclean things which they had seized upon and named. We want some of that honest thinking today. We shall never feel the deep need of God which ached in the hearts of these men so long as we live upon the surface and hide ourselves behind general confessions.

We never know how much evil there is in our hearts till, like these men, we kneel down to sort and name it. Call this thing lying, call that cheating, call that adultery, call that scandal, call that jealousy, call that malice, call that meanness, lay that out before you, each one honestly and fearlessly named; and see then if you will not take the words of Isaac Watts to express your terrible need of God: "Guilty, poor and helpless worm, on thy kind arms I fall." To cover up bad, unclean things by general names is dishonest thinking, vanity of mind. It means that a man is believing in mere appearances, that he is taking refuge in shadows, and according to Paul this is the first stage of utter uncleanness.

Frivolous Minds Cause Hard, Foul Hearts

See now the second stage. A man is accustomed to superficial thinking, to living in mere semblances, to vanity of mind. He appears to pray, and calls it prayer. He calls black gray, and he calls gray white. Now what happens? This happens—the distinctions which he has come to obscure he ceases at last to perceive. Dishonest thinking leads to untrue feeling. Vanity of mind begets hardness of heart.

That is true of the more public form of vanity which infests our social life. Where would you expect to find the hardest hearts in our land? Where would you look for them? Surely among the vain women who have come to believe that dressy appearance is the be-all and the end-all of life! Not among these will you find the soft and tender heart; not among these will you find the friend of the crippled and cruelly treated children. But the principle has a wider application. Men who only appear to pray, and have come to think that when they appear to pray they really pray, grow ever more and more insensitive to the touch of God. Every time we bow our heads to pray, and don't pray, it becomes more difficult for God to make us feel him.

Now they who have passed from vanity of mind to hardness of heart will enter upon the third stage of their degradation, which Paul says consists of all uncleanness and greed. That is quite to be expected. Men who are superficial in thought, and numb in feeling, must inevitably abound in uncleanness and greed. All the gates will be opened to the lower passions of life, and they will rage away in free, unfettered liberty—life will be overrun with swine.

These, then, are the primary characteristics of the old man, the old nature, the old personality—vain thinking, benumbed feeling, uncleanness and greed. In some measure these are the characteristics of all unredeemed lives. They are inherent in the old man, and any schme for their removal will have to be most searching and drastic. How is it to be done? How is man to be saved from vain thinking, from insensitive feeling, from unclean greed?

It is not the superficial problem many suppose. I have read schemes of reform from which it would appear that the only thing mankind needs is a little polish and gloss. But you will never polish men into purity; you will never gloss them into goodness. We all know men who have plenty of gloss, but they are like badly got up linen; they have been glossed before they were washed, and the dirt shows through! Not gloss first, but washing! Not culture first, but washing! Not polished manners, but the washing of the man.

Gospel Creates a New and Growing Personality

How does the gospel of Jesus meet the need? Listen to one of his redeemed who joyfully cries: "He saved us by the washing of regeneration." The washing of regeneration! That is the remedy proposed by the Christ, a washing that will remake a man, that will regenerate him, that will make him to be born again. The gospel of Jesus says that if we are going to rid the life of uncleanness and greed and hard feelings, and false thinking, we must not begin with the circumference but with the center; not with the outside but with the inside; not with the manners but with the man Christianity says that if you begin to polish the outside you may drive the dirt further into the heart, but if you begin with the inside and drive out the uncleanness before you, you will eventually come to have a pure and healthy skin. So by the "washing of regeneration" Christianity makes a clean center, a new man, and from the regenerated personality we are to work out our own salvation.

Now, all the belongings and connections of the old man are not driven out in a day. The new man at the center does not immediately cleanse the life to its circumference. The chains of habits do not usually fall from our hearts as the chains fell from Peter's feet, at one touch of the angel's hand. The drunkard who becomes a new man tonight may feel his chains tomorrow. The fruit of the Spirit is not ripened in an hour or a day! No, we don't immediately lose everything belonging to the old life!

I noticed this last spring that some of the old dead leaves belonging to last summer were still clinging to the trees, but the trees were getting new life to their roots, and they were sending new sap along their branches like an advancing army, and before the new growth the old dead growths were being driven away. I notice the same in the lives of Christian men. There are remnants of the old life clinging to them still; vestiges of old habits; bits of the old Adam; but the sap from the tree of life is circulating in their branches, and before the power of the new man the old growth is being driven away.

It is with Christian men and women as with the lad out of whom the devil was cast. The old nature is not driven out without long and heroic strife. That is a terribly true word which Paul uses when he says that our old man has to be crucified. Have you ever realized the force of the figure? The old man has to be crucified. What is that? "Crucifixion is a long, lingering, thirstful agony!" Our old man, says Paul, has to be crucified; you can't kill it with a stroke; it will die little by little! Remember that, my brother, you who have taken the Lord's side; that passion of yours will not be killed at a stroke; you will have to play the man, the hero, and nail your passion to a cross, and hold it there, until God himself shall say, "It is finished." The old man dies, as the new man gains strength. And the new life in you will grow, the Christ life in you will more and more extend its sway, ever more and more enlarging its dominion, until at length it will reign from center to circumference, and in the glory-world you will awake to find the old nature dead, the old man put off, and Christ Jesus all in all.

THE WAYFARER

"Rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief;
Doctor, lawyer, merchant, chief."

Many Men of Many Minds

THEY WERE nearly all present, as well as several professions unknown when the nursery rhyme was written. This was the annual talkfest of the uplifters; or, more politely, the annual meeting of the Sagamore Sociological Conference. This is the occasion when every kind of reform and every kind of reformer get together to talk things out. There is also a steadying remnant of average, intelligent, hard-headed folk, with no particular hobby but a fundamental public spirit, who keep the zealots from getting too far away from earth. It is wholesome and stimulating for a conservative New England business or professional man to rub elbows with the socialist, the I. W. W. agitator, the philosophical anarchist, the single-taxer and the militant suffragist. Likewise is it good for the soul of the assorted reformers to discover that there be those not of their particular crowd who have a "concern" for the welfare of all mentioned. The fine common spirit, the new tolerance and mutual sympathy which emerge from one of these Sagamore sociological conferences are a definite contribution to the nation's well-being which justifies all the labor and sacrifice of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Coleman and the other big-hearted Sagamore hosts.

Ever since he watched London's safety valve, Hyde park, in operation the Wayfarer has been an advocate of the practical usefulness of free speech. "The cure for the evils of democracy is more democracy." So without any qualms and with rather keen anticipations, he looked forward to hearing such exponents of diverse schools as George W. Perkins of Wall street, Arturo M. Giovannitti of the Industrial Workers of the World and A. J. Portenar of the American Federation of Labor speak on the same day from the same hospitable Sagamore platform. The conditions were ideal; for the nature of the audience precluded ranting and demagoguery and an ignoring of facts. Many of the listeners were experts, and when Mr. Perkins failed to mention certain unlovely aspects of industrial conditions in the United States Steel Corporation, which he was citing as an example of the advantages of regulated cooperation over competition, there were those present who were quick to remind him of his omission; and when Mr. Giovannitti neglected to treat the subject of sabotage, a young Jewish socialist brought him to the issue. When Mr. Portenar lifted righteous hands over I. W. W. outlawry he was promptly reminded that it was the officials of the American Federation of Labor at the one extreme and Massachusetts manufacturers at the other, who had been convicted of dynamiting. It was a lovely and lively discussion; but not a single ill-tempered or bitter word was spoken by anybody. This was an achievement of the American spirit. Everybody felt a new charity toward those whom he had opposed. The immeasurable accomplishment of this Sagamore conference was its demonstration that most of our human problems would be solved if men but knew one another better.

* * * * *

Helen Keller was one of the members of the conference, and one of the speakers. Her appearance afforded an illustration of the fine spirit and quick tact of this strangely commingled company. Of course Miss Keller was roundly applauded; but it was instantly realized that she could not hear this tribute, and straightway there began a stamping upon the floor, so that the deaf-blind woman might feel the vibrations. The Wayfarer is sure that this exhibition of ready wit was first started by somebody more familiar with workingmen's demonstrations than with Back Bay receptions.

* * * * *

While musing over the inspiring evidence that so many different sorts of persons are working, from a variety of angles, toward the common problem of human betterment, the Wayfarer found himself amazed that the church was either ignored or criticised in most of the conference discussions—although Professor Edward A. Steiner, whose address upon immigration was the finest utterance of the occasion, made up for much of this attitude toward the church and inspired other friendly expressions at the closing session. Then it developed that one young Boston woman, a labor leader, had never held a Bible in her hands; but the spirit of Sagamore made her resolve to secure one straightway. Of similar import was the word of a young Jewess that she had learned for the first time that Jesus was a social reformer. Of strictures upon the church there were many. The most biting came from Charles Rann Kennedy, who, however, is a "genius," a veritably "inspired" one, he himself declares. His dramatic readings from the Bible were good, but his treatment of "The Drama as a Social Force" was merely a picturesquely naive exhibition of egotism. His viewpoint is revealed by his own words, "The drama—c'est moi." Nobody could take very seriously his comments upon Christianity.

* * * * *

Why should Giovannitti, once a student at Union Theological Seminary and superintendent of a Methodist mission, be lost to the church? That question was in other minds than the Wayfarer's. The man's basic beliefs are only Christian altruism—he learned his passion for humanity in the church at the feet of men's best Brother. Why were his excess of ardor and his immaturity of judgment allowed to force him outside the pale of organized Christianity? The man is a born dreamer and devotee, and a leader of men. He only needed ripening to be a great minister. Everybody at the Sagamore conference was drawn to the personality of this young zealot, though most viewed with abhorrence or indifference his doctrines, for shown in their nakedness they are seen to be quite impossible.

* * * * *

"Giovannitti does not know how to play," remarked one man on the afternoon devoted to recreation. The sidelight was revealing. Once the I. W. W. leader was drawn into a foot race with his rival of the American Federation of Labor; but in the general festivities he took no part. Even the Sagamore spirit was inadequate to bring this tense soul to the wholesome level of play.

* * * * *

When a highly original game of baseball was played (about fifteen persons to a side) between the I. W. W.'s and the A. F. of L.'s the former found themselves outplayed, and so declared a general strike, followed by a mass meeting and a riot! The sports were interrupted by the appearance of an automobile bearing a suffragist and her banner and newspaper. "Miss Milly Tant" tried to make a speech and precipitated a riot, in which her clothes suffered sorely. But she trounced a policeman and some volunteers; and, at length, after absurd antics, "Miss Milly Tant" was thrown bodily into the ocean. The young minister who impersonated the suffragist, himself a leader in social service who has come up through the ranks of labor, had that wholesome spirit of fun which his friends covet for Mr. Giovannitti; for a sense of humor is indispensable to a successful reformer.

"Coming Back" to the Christian College

BY JOSEPH ROGERS WILSON

Professor Wilson is recognized as an educational leader, whom the Pacific Coast is honored in claiming as its representative. He has a most heartening message for those who may be concerned for the development of the Christian college, whose distinctive place in the American educational system is here strongly emphasized as essential and permanent

THE state university is here as a permanent institution. It is indispensable to the well-being of the state and nation, and is destined to become a still more important influence in promoting the common weal. Overzealous advocates of the denominational college have sometimes called state universities godless institutions. This is unjust. Our state universities for the most part are in a broad and true sense Christian. This character, because of the constituency of their faculties and governing boards, they now have and are likely to retain. For it is impossible that our public institutions should not reflect in some measure the religious character and complexion of the communities where they are established and the state of society out of which they grow.

And yet while this is true and is cheerfully acknowledged, there remains, and is likely to remain, a place in our American system of education for the distinctively Christian college. What this place is will appear from the definition of the idea of a Christian college.

It is a college limited in its scope; primarily a place of instruction, not of original research. It is not a technical school nor a professional school nor a school that aims to take a young man from the high school or academy and fit him for his vocation in life. It is a school which shall take a young man who comes to it and by a well ordered curriculum and under competent instructors make him acquainted with the world into which he has been born and in which he must live and act. He is not thereby made a specialist in any department of knowledge, but is made an intelligent citizen, a competent observer of current events, a man interested in all that affects the social well-being of the age in which he lives. The man who passes through this school and avails himself of what it offers is liberally educated in the best sense of the word; he is a man to whom nothing of human interest is alien. He may, after study, become a specialist, but he will always be something more. He may later become distinguished in a profession, but he will always look upon life with a wider horizon than that of the most liberal of the professions. Such a man is the proper product of the American college. And the Christian college should be in this proper sense an American college.

> "Here, then, is our national peril — that the supremely important task of our generation will fall between church and state and be ignored by both. The church may say: 'Education is no longer in our hands'; the state may say: 'On all religious matters we are silent.' Thus millions may grow up—are actually growing up in America today—without any genuinely religious training. It is time, therefore, for church and school to cooperate, as army and navy cooperate, in defense of our common country."
> —W. H. P. FAUNCE.

There Is No Need of Colossal Endowment

Because of its limited scope the Christian college is a college of modest endowment. To do the work it carefully defines to itself, it needs no colossal financial backing. It may do it, and do it well, on hundreds of thousands, where the university bound to research into all knowledge requires millions. No university, whatever the endowment, can do the proper work of a university and at the same time do as well the proper work of a real American college, provided the college with a competent endowment, a wisely chosen faculty and a well reaonsed curriculum honestly and determinedly endeavors to realize the college idea.

The Christian college thus defined and limited in its scope, and consequently in its necessary endowment, is susceptible of indefinite multiplication and wide distribution. This means that it carries its benefits and opportunities to the doors of multitudes who else could never obtain a college education. The Christian college—the small denominational college if you will—thus becomes the agency of the best and truest university extension. For it is the means of sending into many centers of population university men, not to deliver an occasional lecture or series of lectures out of relation to any well grouped course of training but of planting such men there and gathering about them a body of young men and young women whom they shall instruct and train according to the best principles of the schools.

"The College Must Go to the Student"

But why this waste of means and forces in the multiplication and distribution of colleges? Why not combine, centralize, and so economize? We speak of the student as going to college. So he does, but there is a sense in which, if the college and student ever come together, the college must go to the student. All colleges are in a large measure local schools. This is true even of the great universities. Study their catalogues in the undergraduate departments and note how small the circle from which the major part of their students come. With all the gathering of students in the great schools from far and wide, it is still true for the great majority that if the student and college meet, the college must go to the student. And this the Christian college does.

The college here described is almost necessarily a small college. That is, it is limited in the number of its students and faculty as well as in the scope of its curriculum. This is quite consonant with its idea, and is to its advantage. Whatever advantage there may be in the gathering together of great numbers is more than counterbalanced by the advantage of the student in small numbers.

There is a marked returning on the part of thoughtful college presidents and officers to the old idea of close personal contact between instructor and student. We have had a generation of the dominance of the idea that the instructor is concerned only with his subject and has little or no concern for the individual who sits under his instruction. The results have not been satisfactory. College officers have found that boys from 18 to 20 are yet men in the making, and that it is not quite safe to leave them wholly to the making of each other. The day when freshmen and sophomores are left to the instruction of an inexperienced tutor in the classroom and wholly to their own counsels and devices outside has, or will soon have, passed. Great universities are either planning to leave these classes to the smaller colleges, as sooner or later they must do, or else give them the best instruction and best counsel they can furnish, at any cost. In days past we have heard a good deal of the doctrine of the survival of the fittest in reference to college boys, the easy doctrine that acknowledged the perils but quieted conscience with the maxim that if a boy had the right stuff in him he would come through the perils all right. There is a good deal in this, but the men who feel themselves responsible for results are waking to the fact that it is a costly doctrine, that the waste incurred is too great; especially when it is remembered that the waste is in human character.

There is advantage then, inestimable advantage, in a college that offers a liberal and thorough education under conditions that admit of personal contact of instructor and student, and that provide for the personal interest of the college officers in the students' well-being. This becomes a still greater advantage when the whole spirit of college instruction is one that regards the student as of more value than the subject; and the subject simply as an instrumentality for making a well trained and well furnished man out of the student. It is a great thing to make researches into new fields of learning, and so to enlarge the domain of human knowledge; it is a great thing to make books setting forth to the world the new things discovered, or the old things in a new and attractive form; but it is a greater thing to make men. To make men is the first business of a college, according to the Christian idea, which is to direct all the instruction and resources of the college intelligently, conscientiously and persistently to this end.

A Christian college, though not necessarily a school of religious instruction, should be a place of Christian worship where the great doctrines of God as the creator, moral governor and redeemer of the world are accepted as fundamental beliefs. Without requiring formal adherence to the peculiar doctrines of this or that church, the college should seek for its instructors men who can hold the fundamental doctrines of Christianity consistently with the soundest teachings of their several departments of knowledge. It is a great thing for our nation to have scattered throughout the land schools of sound learning which yet have these great faiths, and which are therefore free in their instruction to draw upon the wide and varied resources of the Christian Scriptures, and to hold up, as presenting at once a pattern for character and an incentive to noble living, the ineffable story of the life and teachings of the Man of Nazareth.

The Motive That Makes Men Ministers

BY J. BEVERIDGE LEE

Few men have had a closer or more sympathetic insightng appeal for consecration to Christian service printed here of St. Paul church, Philadelphia. For four years he was in constant contact with the young men of American colleges and universities, and he is well qualified to present the stimulati into the hearts and minds of young men than Dr. Lee

IN THE paternal prayers offered in the family circle during my boyhood appeared a tremendous word. Young as I was—and how young I was I cannot now determine—the word made a singular impression. As it was repeated again and again it gripped my mind, it shadowed my imagination, it challenged my conscience and it besieged my will.

At that time I did not question why the word insisted upon traveling everywhere with me, or why it recurred so frequently in my father's prayers. As I think back to it now, I am led to suspect that it became a word of import to me because it was a word of import to him. He was a Christian minister. Long before I was born he had turned away from lucrative business opportunities, denied to himself the attractive profession that his father had honored and, burdened by a sense of universal obligation, had devoted his life to his fellows in ministries that were either inadequately rewarded or entirely unpaid.

This word that he used so frequently told why he had done so. It was a word crammed with his religious passion, colored with his consecration and interwoven with his experience. Even though I did not then understand this, it is no wonder that the word impressed me more than all the rest of his prayers, and built a home in my mind when all other thoughts quickened by phrase or petition had folded their tents and stolen silently away. This tremendous word of my boyhood was RESPONSIBILITY.

At first it was only a word, then it became a haunting thought, afterwards a feeling and a conviction. At every crossroad in life I found it standing like a fingerpost pointing me away from trades and professions and directing me along the track of the paternal footsteps into the ministry of Christ. Today I realize that I am in the Christian ministry because my preacher father quickened within me, through the prayer use of this word responsibility, his own sense of universal obligation.

Many Lives Not Thus Magnetized

But not every young man has been so fortunate as to have had his life thus magnetized. Whatever texts the past generation may have enforced, it never preached its greatest sermons from the text, "What hast thou that thou didst not receive?" The younger generation has lacked a pulpit commanding enough to compel it to appreciate its inheritance, to live up to its birthright and to consecrate its best. The church of today repeats Jehovah's order, "Go to Nineveh!" but fails in securing adequate response because the church of yesterday did not cry with authority and passion, "Arise!" The older generation failed to transmit its sense of responsibility; as a result the younger generation fails to respond to the call of duty. Young men of conspicuous ability are missed from the Christian ministry not because of the love of ease or the lust for gold, nor because their lives have been secularized, but because they have never been made to feel the divine imperative.

During a ministry of four years to the men of American colleges and universities I was frequently interviewed by students who were concerned as to the choice of a vocation and eager to know what constituted a call to the ministry. Anyone who has attempted to answer these questions in specific terms well knows the difficulty of the task. When Jesus said to the fishermen of Galilee, "Follow me and I will make you to become fishers of men," the call was clear and unmistakable; when Paul had his unique experience on the Damascus road there was left in his mind no perhaps or peradventure; but when Matthias was elevated to the apostolate, his call was so commonplace and so lacking in supernatural accompaniments that commentators cannot agree as to whether it was real or assumed, and his election legitimate or unwarranted. The average young man does not ask to be called in the same manner as the men of Galilee, or as was Paul, but he has seen so many ministers like Matthias, whose call he himself suspects, that he is scrupulously careful in determining his own relation to the bishropic. He wants to avoid partial judgments and mistaken leadings. The question of the ministry is bewildering to him—and I confess that I have been conscious of giving help to him only as I have minimized both the advantages and the hardships involved and emphasized the responsibility, for to me a call to the ministry is not a lure but a divine compulsion.

Christ's Sense of Responsibility

A study of the life of Christ will show that a sense of responsibility entered in to determine his own life work. Indeed, the first recorded word of the Master has to do with his choice of a vocation. His parents, familiar with the aptitude with which he gave help to his carpenter father, would have hurried him back from Jerusalem to the uncompleted tasks of the workshop as soon as their own special errand was completed; but he, conscious of an endowment that was unemployed in his carpentry, and of a capacity for helping humanity that remained idle, even when he shaped his plows to the best models, tarried among the teachers of religion, and declared, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

Neither here nor afterwards, when he said that he "must work," "must preach," "must suffer," did any voice come to him from the opening sky, but the summons came from within. No external authority ordained him; his ordination was his coordination with God—his love, his desire to save and his power to save men. His call was his self-consciousness. His temptation was not to a transgression of moral precepts but to a nonconformity to the law of his unique personality. His struggle was to be true to himself, for only by being true to himself could he be true to man and God.

The same teaching appears frequently in Christ's oral ministry. It rings out with startling plainness in the passage so often quoted in connection with the more trivial things of life, "Freely ye have received, freely give." In the parables of the pounds and the talents it receives peculiar emphasis. In the pounds the master explicitly creates a trust fund when he says, "occupy," or as the revision gives it, "trade ye herewith." In the talents no mention is made of occupancy or trading, and the language would seem to indicate a gift. But, even though each has received a gift, he remains a servant, responsible to his master for all that he has. When the master returned and reckoned, and when the one-talented man brought back the talent and his apology for its nonuse, the master rebuked him with the words, "Thou oughtest." And yet no command to invest it had been given. It was not needed. The obligation to use it to the best advantage was self-evident and automatic. Both parables agree in illustrating the truth that God has endowed every man with a certain ability, that the endowment demands investment and the ability an undertaking, and that the faithful use of one's talents for God will bring satisfactory returns to one's self.

This obligation to use, this sense of responsibility, is fundamental. In determining a vocation it can neither be ignored nor violated without frustrating one's divine call and missing one's real vocation.

In the Battle Against Egoism

One value of responsibility is that it sensitizes life to the world's need. It makes the religious life social and philanthropic and sacrificial. It battles against egoism and fosters otherism; it denies individualism and affirms the solidarity of humanity; it trains from provincialism into the cosmopolitan thought and feeling and action worthy a citizen of the world of God's love. The Buddhist faith requires every priest of its millions in Asia to spend some time each day in contemplating the miseries of mankind, that sympathy may be kept alive. Responsibility does that for the follower of Christ. It keeps alive his sympathy and makes him—

> "feel
> The vastness of the agony of earth,
> The vainness of its joys, the mockery
> Of all its best, the anguish of its worst;
> Since pleasures end in pain, and youth in age,
> And love in loss, and life in hateful death."

These heart needs of humanity will find only blind eyes, and these heart cries only deaf ears, until men have been fused into fellow feeling by the obligations of grace. Millions of non-Christians offer to Christians "a chance to work hard at work worth doing," which Mr. Roosevelt says to be "the best chance that life gives," but the chance will remain untaken and the work undone until Christians grapple with the world's sin, under pressure of the same obligation of love that gave to them the Christ of Bethlehem and Calvary.

Besides, responsibility sensitizes life to divine leading. When a life is thus sensitized it never lacks waymarks in the most obscure path of duty; but it discovers in passing events providences, in littlest opportunities signals of eternity, and in minutest incidents whisperings of God. Responsibility quickens responsiveness, and responsiveness finds direction. Rarely is the whole itinerary discoverable from the start. All the guideposts to vocation do not stand at the beginning of the way, but whoever follows faithfully the guideposts today will surely find other guideposts awaiting tomorrow.

Today a man may know certainly no more than that he is to play in the divine orchestra; tomorrow he will receive his instrument and will be assigned to his place. Today he may know only that he is part of God's working force, but tomorrow will give to him his implement and reveal his field and his task. Knights of the grail found that the clew to the quest was to be found most frequently in the obscure byways of commonplace service, and many a one lost his place at the round table because he neglected inconspicuous duties while hoping for heroic deeds.

Beside my table lies a rug of intricate design. The Oriental who made it missed the pattern one day, for some reason, and never afterwards through all his weaving of the rug was he able to correct his mistake, which became more and more apparent as the rug became complete. In like fashion every failure to respond to present duty, however insignificant, leaves a flaw in life's pattern and texture that will disorder all that comes afterwards, and that will appear even when the causes have been forgotten. The only safe rule in following duty is to put all of life into every act, for these acts woven into the warp of the years make vocations. Life's supreme vocation will be found reflecting itself in every duty mastered with fidelity to the imperial ought.

Sense of Obligation a Divine Call

It is thus that both my experience and my judgment agree that the sense of obligation is God's oracle through which he utters his calls to men—the Urim and Thummim, brightening or darkening to reveal his will. Whoever reverences this ephod and keeps it untarnished will never lack the guidance of God, even in the most bewildering doubt. For him a path will appear over uncharted seas and across trackless deserts. The wise and prudent man, eager to find his vocation, will keep his sense of responsibility reverent and alert. To do this he will meditate much upon the marvelous goodness of God; and will think deeply upon the wonders of his love; and will diligently study himself and his relation to the profound meanings of the cross. Having found the vocation that he is certain God intends for him, he will try to help others who are groping purposefully toward the work in which they can most advantage God, by restating for them the noblesse oblige, in some such fashion as I am accustomed to state it to myself.

Capability involves responsibility. I am, therefore I ought. The direction of my life is defined, primarily, by my instincts, aspirations and endowments. What I am determines what I must do. What I am in Christ determines what I must do for Christ. I am bound to invest my life in the vocation that will yield to God the largest return for what he has invested in me.

A Safe Combination

Brown, who recently moved into new quarters in a downtown office building, prides himself upon his affability toward all classes with whom he comes in contact.

A day or two after he occupied his new offices he encountered an old colored woman industriously scrubbing the marble floor of the corridor, chanting the while a doleful, dirgelike air.

"Auntie," commented Brown, "that's a mournful tune you're singing."

"Yas, sir," she answered, "I knows it's mo'nful, but by singin' dat chune an' mindin' ma own business I ain't makin' no interference with my gittin' to heaben."

The editor was dying, but when the doctor bent over, placed his ear on his breast and said, "Poor man! Circulation almost gone," the dying editor sat up and shouted: "You're another! We have the largest circulation in the country!"

The Ideal College Man

By John Willis Baer

1. He must make a good appearance, but need not be handsome.
2. Careful in personal appearance, but not a "dandy."
3. Jolly, accommodating, considerate and a true sportsman.
4. If an athlete and meeting other requirements, so much the better, but if not athletic, it need not detract.
5. He must be a good conversationalist and realize that a girl is not flattered by always having nonsense talked to her.
6. Show respect and reverence to the aged.
7. Show the same gentlemanliness with men as with women.
8. Not serenely sit in the street cars while an old man or an old woman stands, and then arise suddenly and offer a seat to a pretty girl.
9. Not smoke or drink or be guilty of the attendant evils.
10. Not sneer at religion or joke lightly about it.
11. The young women recognize no difference in standards for men and for women.
12. The young women can only truly respect those men who live by principle and not by others' opinions.
13. The young women recognize the young women's influence over the young man's conduct, but do not hold the young woman responsible for the young man's conduct.
14. The young women expect respect for their opinions and respect for the things which others esteem, and they admire reverence for religion.
15. The young women want the same dignity and reserve in the young men at all times that the men expect and ask for in them.

These fifteen "ideals" represent "higher" living—and, after all, that is the highest education. Sound learning is good, but pure living is better; sound learning and pure living—that is best.

> "Four things a man must learn to do
> If he would make his record true;
> To think without confusion clearly;
> To love his fellow men sincerely;
> To act from honest motives purely;
> To trust in God and heaven securely."

Our Readers Tell of School Experiences

Some months ago The Continent offered prizes for letters from readers telling of their experiences in and out of school, and the benefits they have felt in after life. Expressions were also asked from young men and young women as to why they chose their school, and from parents who have children away from home at school. These letters furnish a very practical discussion of the highly important question of higher education and its bearing on life

What College Did for Me

BY A MARRIED WOMAN

[Prize Winner]

MY FIRST severe test in determination, and the first real blow to my pride, came to me during my first week in college. In high school my teachers had conscientiously believed that, whether I could do anything else or not, I could write compositions. My freshman English professor thought otherwise, and I had to go back to the elements of composition work. In other subjects my preparation proved almost as inadequate. Notes of warning regarding my deficiences were perilously frequent. My situation was difficult, but I made up my mind there was only one thing to do—conquer it. And conquer it I did, by good hard work, developing some healthy will power at the same time.

Not that I achieved anything brilliant; I am far from the glory of a Phi Beta Kappa key. Still, after the freshman year my work proved fairly easy. Along certain lines of scholarship I even won occasional small triumphs. Gradually the tactful approval of the professors helped to produce a new variety of self-confidence. I had entered college with a lofty estimate of the recognition due to my intellectual abilities. I left college with the consciousness that I had a little well grounded ability of worthy possibilities, in so far as it should be developed and applied toward the happiness of other people. This I consider the most vital result of my college training.

In bringing about both mental and moral improvement, nearly every course of study shows its more or less definite value. For instance, a rigid chemistry course forced me to the discovery of the necessity of accuracy, order and careful planning. That laboratory experience saves energy and time in my housekeeping. Especially in preparing for an unusual number of guests, I find that to work as I learned to work under high pressure in the chemistry laboratory prevents a surprising amount of confusion and weariness. The zoology and botany courses had a peculiarly religious significance. When the microscope showed the marvelous formation of the tiniest bits of animal and vegetable life, I felt a new depth of reverence for the infinite skill of the Maker. An enjoyable acquaintance with good pictures came with an art course in the old masters. A liking for good books was stimulated by several excellent courses in literature. In the German classes I learned to carry on a limited conversation in that language, to love it well enough to continue its study at my leisure. That fearsome ordeal, the student lecture, gave me confidence in speaking. In club work and in giving long oral reports of any nature, I am often heartily grateful for this training. It is fortunate that college supplied me with a good deal of English work, for I am one of those unlucky victims who are always getting elected secretary of things, particularly of things requiring numerous reports for year books and newspapers. Also, I am thankful for practice in history research; it helps me to find quickly the material needed for literary clubs and for my Bible class.

My college career readily manifested its commercial value. High school teaching, with a steadily growing salary, soon provided much more money than a normal course could have enabled me to command. Through the first year of married life an opportunity to tutor a young girl comfortably increased a slender income. Now occasional short stories bring forth modest checks—very simple stories that college English taught me to write. And writing them gives me as much pleasure as the money.

To college I owe nearly all of my present enjoyment of music. The only concord of sweet sounds that had pleased me previous to my entrance was chorus singing, especially if it happened to be a rousing gospel hymn. But the wonderful organ, the violins that spoke with the appeal of human voices and the magnificent inspiration of the great college choir gave me one of the richest gifts of my college experience.

Among her college benefits many a woman confesses warmest gratitude of all for social blessings. Those blessing have been mine. There is lasting pleasure in the memory of the royal good times at college. In addition, college helped me to enjoy meeting strangers, to "go half way" in making friends and to choose my intimate friends more wisely than before. But if college had granted me nothing except the friends who are growing constantly dearer, college would still be worth while. And—best gift of all—without the social as well as the mental influence of college life, I'm sure I should not be able to contribute my share to a blessedly satisfying comradeship with my big-hearted, broad-minded husband.

What College Did for Me

BY A BUSINESS WOMAN

[Prize Winner]

AS I HAVE thought of "what college did for me" I have found myself asking these questions: What were the immediate and practical values of my college training? What direct bearing has it had upon my professional and business life? And again, What intellectual and spiritual values did I derive from my four years in college? Am I better, wiser or happier than I would otherwise have been?

Clearly understanding that a college is not a professional school and that its function is to provide a liberal education and not vocational training in the ordinary sense of the word, let me try to indicate briefly, first, what I may term some utilitarian results of my college course, and secondly, the so-called "cultural" results. In so doing I shall mention certain things not found in college catalogues, but which I believe to be of first importance.

Among the valuable assets of a business woman I can think of none more profitable than a knowledge of human nature. College life in our day affords a pretty wide range of material for this important study. A college is no longer the abode of scholars only but the common meeting ground of all sorts and conditions of men and women. Every modern interest and every social rank is represented there. Rubbing up against students reared in a different environment, whose standards and ideals were totally unlike my own, taught me much. College life draws out one's powers and cultivates the "good mixer." In other words, it develops tact and affords insight of high value in business matters, where judicious management and a knowledge of character are essential to success.

A second quality of immediate practical service to a business woman is ingenuity, the ability to handle new and perplexing situations, to think a problem through. College life, both within and without the classroom, begets versatility and skill in this regard. In my college days we were constantly reminding ourselves that whereas money might work wonders, it was our privilege and prerogative to employ brains and to incur as little expense as possible. We never found our college shows dull or unpopular because of this, but rather the opposite. I have found the same principle applicable to business. A little earnest thought often saves waste of time, energy and money.

As to the curriculum, economics taught me the laws of trade, and principles of sound finance; history emphasized the power of public opinion and the advantages of organization; algebra and trigonometry inculcated accuracy; chemical analysis, precision; logic and languages, facility of expression; physical education, preservation of health, and so on through the list. All have been helpful.

I feel most decidedly, however, that college did vastly more than directly increase my business efficiency. It gave me inestimable advantages of another kind. Constant preoccupation with one's business affairs tends inevitably to narrowness and selfishness. My years at college broadened my outlook and fostered sympathy with and tolerance for views of life at variance with my own. They established the feeling, too, that when good men differ both sides must be heard before an opinion of value can be pronounced.

College life quickened and developed my powers of appreciation and taught me to find permanent satisfaction in good literature, art, music and drama. After a hard day at the office I have resources at my command that refresh my mind and afford genuine re-creation, a matter of no small consideration. My present interest in the social and industrial problems of the hour and in contemporary political history is very largely owing to the impetus it received from college influences.

And finally, I believe the spiritual values which came, and still come, from my college associations are paramount to all others. The loyal friendships formed on the campus, the high ideals of duty appropriated for my own, the optimistic outlook on life and the world there acquired, all inspire me to the highest possible service to my generation. It is for these priceless gifts of the mind and spirit that I am chiefly grateful to my college, the full value and ultimate influence of which I cannot better describe than by quoting from Matthew Arnold. Speaking of "culture," in my opinion the highest product of college training, he says:

"What we are concerned for is the thing, not the name; and the thing, call it by what name we will, is simply the enabling ourselves by getting to know, whether through reading, observing or thinking, the best that can at present be known in the world, to come as near as we can to the firm intelligible law of things, and thus to get a basis for a less confused action and a more complete perfection than we have at present."

Why I Chose My School

BY A YOUNG WOMAN IN COLLEGE

[Prize Winner]

THE COLLEGE which I attend is a small denominational coeducational school, with about 500 students enrolled. It is located in a village amidst beautiful scenery. This little college has sent forth many noble men and women, who have gone to all corners of the earth as missionaries, who have become college presidents, ministers, teachers and, last but not least by any means, homemakers.

This college is not heavily endowed; in fact, it is making a courageous struggle for more money to erect new buildings and better its equipment. Its faculty is not made up of men of renown. Then why, you ask, did I choose this school for my own?

To begin with, I believe in small colleges rather than in large universities, unless some special line of work is to be taken up and studied exhaustively. In great universities so many students from all parts of the world are gathered that the instructors, leaders in thought though they may be, can give very little attention to each individual one. In a small school, on the other hand, any latent talent or ability of the student is quickly noted and is cultivated. It is possible for the instructors in a small school to have the interests of their individual pupils more at heart.

Besides the close relation between students and teachers there is an even closer one between the students themselves. Only about 1 per cent of our young people ever go away to college, but as a general rule the most intelligent, the most ambitious and the most promising young people from refined and cultured homes are the ones who have the opportunity. It is worth any young person's while to meet and become acquainted with these desirable students. The interchange of ideas and the character study possible are a part of the education itself.

One hears much about coeducational schools, both for and against. Why did I, a girl, choose a coeducational school? Before a girl accepts a life partner she must know something about those who would settle her destiny. There is no better place than a coeducational college to become acquainted with the opposite sex. Before going out to fight life's battles a girl must be strong, and she must know how to conduct herself. In my estimation a coeducational school is the best place to gain that self-confidence and poise which mark the efficient, capable woman. In a coeducational school a girl meets men and she learns the discrimination so necessary in selecting her friends.

I have given some of the general reasons for choosing my school. Now I shall be more specific and personal. The quiet little village where this college is located is the exact spot for a heathy outdoor life. There are no "movies," theaters, dance halls, gambling dens, or any other places of doubtful attraction; only the wooded hills, quiet streams and pleasant valleys. The very life of the place is the college life.

I believe one reason why such a small per cent of our population ever go to college is the great expense entailed by it. But here after tuition has been paid and books bought one can live as cheaply as at home.

Another reason why I chose this college is its deep religious influence. In a denominational institution this force is strongly felt and one cannot leave the school without seriously wondering if one is really fulfilling the mission God meant to be hers.

I might add as my last reason that this college is near my home. I know the caliber of its students and am in thorough sympathy with its aims. Therefore, instead of feeling as if I were out in the world among strangers and in new surroundings, I feel as if I were a member of a big family in a pleasant home.

Why I Sent My Daughter to Boarding School

[PRIZE WINNER]

BECAUSE there was no high school in my village and it was therefore necessary to send her away from the inestimable advantages of a mother's loving care.

Because, though I could have sent her by train daily to the city high school twenty miles away, too early hours and travel unaccompanied were objectionable.

Because as a former public school teacher I object to the cramming system there pursued. What I want is the evolution of original thinking power.

Because I object to the lax care in morals and the often poorly guarded association of boys and girls in these same city schools.

Because I found a boarding school on the edge of a vast city park up to the standard of the best women's colleges, where the Bible is the most important textbook and where the school is not too large for the managers and instructors to have personal knowledge and motherly care of each student.

Because the musical advantages are unsurpassed in the Middle West, and other elective studies—physical culture, domestic science, etc. —are taught.

Because there is a self-help department, with no invidious distinction between students, and students are encouraged to become leaders of thought and activity instead of floating "in the swim."

While I do not oppose our excellent public school system, it was only intended by its founders to furnish a primary education necessary for citizenship in a republic. In its higher reaches a state education far too often fails in the most essential things. In boarding schools one can select his kind.

Though I do not oppose coeducation, yet in the adolescent stage boys and girls should receive no little instruction separately, so that I was not unwilling to have my child in a school for girls only, at least until she is well along in studies.

Of course one must discriminate between schools. I tried the boarding school experiment this year with hesitation at first, and prayerful attention. We saw our daughter now and again. She ever had the stimulus of our loving expectation to guide her activities, guard her morals and keep her free from homesickness. I am more than pleased with results as she returns after commencement.

These are some of the reasons why I sent my daughter to a boarding school and expect to do so the coming year. A FATHER.

What College Did for Me

BY A PROFESSIONAL WOMAN

[PURCHASED]

OUR FAMILY belongs to the class that is generally termed the respectable poor. We have always lived in a small town where a good public school is maintained. With an invalid mother we children had to take turn about keeping house and going to school.

When I was 19 it was decided that I, the youngest, should have a year at college. With a brother, and two sisters who were teaching, to back me financially, I went to a small college not many miles from home. I had never been away from home before, and as I was a very reserved girl, nothing appealed to me save the practical; therefore I worked with all the energy there was in me. My everyday desire was to be one of the best of my class and to keep my name on the honor roll, which meant an average grade of 90 per cent.

I had never felt the gnawing of ambition very much, as it never occurred to me that there would be a chance to rise above mediocrity. But there, in the classrooms, I found boys and girls who were poorer than I and much more ambitious; boys and girls who were working their way, slowly but surely, to the coveted goal. I found, too, that one of the professors was a self-made man. Through his own efforts he had received an A. B. degree from one of the best colleges of the state.

I had no plans for the future. I was not looking any farther ahead than examination day. Just to hold my own with the crowd was the extent of my ambition. Eventually I found myself becoming interested in the young girls who were taking up district school teaching as a means toward securing their college education. I began to see that determination and persistence would bring about things worth possessing. So in June of the same year I took the county examination, and after receiving my license, applied for a school and was accepted on the face of the application, as it was too far away to see the board personally.

This was my beginning, and I have now had six years' experience as teacher in my own and adjoining counties. My work has ranged anywhere from first to seventh grade. I have never felt exactly competent to teach, as my education is yet limited. I could have finished in one more year, and with a degree I might have believed myself more capable. Two deaths in the family prevented my further work in college, as I had myself and my mother to provide for. So it was imperative that I continue teaching, and I am doing so still.

Had it not been for this one year at college I cannot imagine what my fate would have been, for I have no other accomplishments whereby I might earn my living. College also opened my eyes to the larger things of life; to the vastness of the work that is waiting for competent hands. It was there I learned to stand or fall on my own merit. I had no idea I was so strong; that I had so much confidence in myself. In short, I came to know myself better, and I found out what my capabilities are and how to put them into practical use.

A short time ago I viewed our capital city from the highest pinnacle of our new state capitol. Then going down to the street again I could see nothing but immense buildings on either side. It leads me to conclude that elevation means vision, mental as well as physical.

My story is a simple one, but I wish it might reach hundreds of boys and girls who, perhaps, feel they are—as I once thought myself—incapable of doing anything worth while. My advice to them is, go to college—but go with a purpose in view and attain to it, despite the difficulties that may confront you.

Why I Chose My School

BY A YOUNG MAN IN COLLEGE

[PRIZE WINNER]

WHEN I graduated from high school I was determined to go to college at once. I intended to take at least six years, and possibly eight, of college work, and the first two or four of these years I intended to spend on a literary course, specializing later as a forester or civil engineer. Therefore the question presented itself of the college I should choose for my literary course.

Three reasons influenced my decision. First, and perhaps most important, I wanted a "small" college. I foresaw that my first four years in college would have a great influence on my life; that in these years I would be maturing my ideas, forming my ideals and developing my philosophy of life, and I thought I ought to place myself in a school where I would come into direct personal touch with men bigger than myself. I felt that I needed as intimate contact as possible with men who had a clean, clear-headed philosophy of life; men who knew more than I knew, who, because of their mature years, had a broader outlook than I had. I believed, from talking with college men, that such an intimate contact with the professors was possible only in a small school, and careful consideration convinced me that, from this standpoint, my chosen college offered the opportunity I desired.

My second reason for my choice was a financial one. It was necessary for me almost entirely to work my way through school, and therefore I wanted to go to a school which not only presented opportunities for self-support but which encouraged it. I wanted a school where the prevailing tone was one of democracy and where self-supporting men were respected rather than looked down upon. My ideas were somewhat decided on this point, and as I expected to spend several years in school it was but natural that I should consider the atmosphere in which I should be working. Investigation led me to believe that my college was exactly the one I was seeking from this standpoint.

My last reason for my choice was that I wanted a coeducational school. I believed in the daily association of men and women in their work and play. I believed that the presence of women in an institution not only exerted a refining influence on a man's daily life, not only gave him more of culture but that it added to the moral and religious tone of the college. My mother's knowledge of the coeducational policies and rules of the school of my choice led me to decide that it fulfilled this requirement.

These are the main reasons why I chose as I did. As there are many other schools nearer home than my own, I think I may truthfully say that I was not prejudiced by its availability or nearness. I studied the question carefully, giving thorough consideration to the advice of older men and women, and reached my decision only at the end of my senior year in high school. LAWRENCE T. WYLY.

The Young Women and the Christian Training School

THE NATURE of the church's responsibility to the world makes women's work an indispensable factor. The church then must see to it that she is trained so as to focalize the spirit of the church upon social and religious problems of society. Her heart moves forces that cannot otherwise be moved; the culture of child life, the stimulation of patriotism, inspiration to religious devotion —these all depend very heavily upon woman's heart and hand.

Only a woman can save a woman at the bottom of the spiritual and moral ladder. The sympathetic hand of a Christian woman is next in virtue to the hand of the Master. It is her voice that commands and holds fast when other voices waver and fail. Therefore the young women must secure the very best train-

When You Miss Your Train in China

BY KATHARINE CRANE

I WAS returning to the college after a Sunday in the city. The four-mile ride would take about thirty-five minutes, but my ricksha was ordered early to provide against any delay. It was possible we might be stopped a quarter of an hour by the entrance into the capital of some high official and his train. No such event occurred, however; my puller did valiantly and we arrived at the Hsichimen station gate fifteen minutes before train time. But no crowd was waiting, the ticket office was closed. The thing had a doubtful look. I tapped on the window, which opened obligingly, and to my inquiry the English-speaking agent responded, "Train for Chinghuayuan just now go." Past tense was unquestionably intended.

When one has been in the Orient more than two months (I had been here three) one doesn't remonstrate under such circumstances with all the people, official or otherwise, who happen to be within speaking distance. Neither does one question a perfectly honest and faithful watch. You simply consider the best thing to do next. To return to friends to whom one has said good-by would be embarrassing; to go to the shopping district would take an hour and another hour for the return. The next train would leave at 12:40 (if not somewhat earlier). I decided to walk the four miles to the college. Several times I had considered taking that walk alone rather than wait for the infrequent train, but had been afraid of the vague and unknown things that might make it unpleasant. But one of the reasons why I am thankful I came to China is that so many of the unknown terrors of the world have tumbled off the map.

Fortunately for me this lovely May morning I had little to burden me, for a missionary's closet had made a suitcase unnecessary. I started off with cheerful reminiscences of the times in my own college life when the teacher hadn't appeared, and hoped that my class had the proper spirit.

A little path at either side of the track made good walking, which was occasionally varied by strolling along at the edge of the fields. On either side stretched double rows of young willows that will some day make a verdant avenue for the little train to pass through. Birds were chirping about and alighting in the willows—some wrens, many sparrows and a white-winged sort that did not seem familiar. A magpie flashed his black and white wings before me and at a little distance a low whistle betrayed the whereabout of a pigeon. The Chinese have an interesting custom of putting whistles on the pigeons' tails, so that often a flock of them sailing against the wind sounds like a siren horn. The edge of the cultivated ground abounded in blue asters and wild sweet peas in blue and white, and the dear little dandelions won my heart, they looked so like last year's crop as I saw it in a far-away land.

Before me lay green fields laid out in careful rows and the wheat was several inches high. Millet, corn and sweet potato plants filled other fields, and not a foot was wasted. The neatly planted rows spoke eloquently of industry and precision and the absence of fences made these look not unlike the broad farm lands of Illinois. There was about the same number of trees in the landscape too. But soon many differences began to show themselves. All through the fields, in contrast with greenness, were gray mounds like gigantic ant hills, resisting by a superior tenure the needs of the people for daily foods. These irregular groups of earthen hills were the resting places of the dead of each household, and they seemed to occupy a full third of the ground. Some were dome-shaped and lay in the shade of a group of willows or beautiful cedars, and were sometimes covered with concrete. These were the graves of Mohammedans, and they were more numerous than I should have expected.

Occasional farmers in blue cotton coat and baggy trousers were working with spade or hoe and mothers and their children were gathering the favorite greens to be cooked for the 10 o'clock breakfast, the first of the two meals of the day. These little children were very cunning and (when not too dirty) were as sweet as any little folks. Three small boys of one family wore little trousers with shoulder straps like overalls, and made me think of certain little chaps in America.

Some fellow travelers I met from time to time, carrying their goods tied up in a piece of blue cloth. One man pushed a wheelbarrow, another carried two baskets at either end of a pole, nicely balanced on his shoulder. Still another load in a big basket was suspended on a pole, either end of which rested on the shoulder of a bronzed laborer. Presently some teamsters crossed the road in front. The two-wheeled cart was heavily laden with stone and the two hard-working beasts, hitched tandem, had all they could do to pull it across the track, encouraged by the "huc huc" of the drivers, who walked alongside. The hindmost animal was a sad looking horse that humbly paced behind a donkey half his size, and I wondered if the humiliation did not hurt him more than the labor. He gave me no light on the subject, and I turned to look at a little cottage close at hand. It was better than many I had passed, for its walls were built of sun-dried brick, instead of mud, and its roof was covered with gray tiles. Around it was a neat fence of plaited reeds and the whole made a pleasant, homelike effect.

Another farmhouse, at a little distance, had its plaster walls painted a cheery red, that contrasted finely with the brown earth and fast growing crops about it. On many of the farmhouse roofs was a layer of sod, well dried by winter's frost and summer's sun, calling to mind the Scripture reference to "the grass upon the housetop which withereth before it groweth up." Near one of them was a well, with stone curb and rope and pails, from which a muscular farmer, with back bared to the burning sun, drew water to irrigate his fertile land. In another dooryard was a flour mill, consisting of a stone disk and a roller pulled round and round by a donkey, his eyes covered to prevent his growing dizzy.

As the sun rose higher more farmers shed their upper garments, baring the brown bodies to the waist. The women were always modestly covered from head to foot and many of the children also. But here and there some little child of nature had rid himself of the restraints which a thoughtless social convention had imposed and moved about the fields like a little brown beetle in the green grass. There were many other little farmhouses like those I have described, made of mud, or sun-dried brick or plaster, painted a beautiful Venetian red and usually fenced with the cleverly plaited reeds. For many, a group of willows added just the touch that completed a very charming homelike picture. The farms were a striking indication of what the people must be in character. Scarcely a foot of ground was barren, except that which remained sacred to members of the family who had finished earthly toil. As far as the eye could reach there were the green fields, with the varied crops all planted by hand with the utmost precision. Surely there will be no famine in this part of China next fall.

The people I passed gave me curious looks and often from the women and children I received a friendly smile, or a mother held up a baby to see the foreign lady. Some were Manchu women and wore the high square headdress even at their work, while the Chinese frequently wore in their low-combed hair one of the artificial flowers of which they are so fond. I often tried with no success to tell the smallest boys and girls apart. The little tonsured heads of the 2-year-olds or the 4-year-olds, with three to five tiny pigtails braided tight with bright red or green ribbons till they stuck out straight from the little heads, were alike undistinguishable to my dull vision.

Now my walk was drawing to a close, for the neat modern stone station of Chinghuayuan was before me. I paused to wonder what effect the railroad is silently working on the primitive life about it. The train approached on its return trip and I thought it was laughing because it had run away from me. But little did I care, for with all its rush and hideous rumbling it had missed the beauty and the contentment that a lovely quiet nature had poured into my morning.

The college buildings next appeared, the red-tiled two-story one, rising in imperial dignity above the one-story dormitories of the students, the simple low recitation halls, the bungalows of the American teachers and the picturesque old yamen that remains to speak of a former age—the day when the great estate was the home of the Boxer Prince Tuan.

Just across from our big gateway was a motley group of venders offering many kinds of food—fruit, peanuts and eggs being most numerous. Here the many servants and the workmen employed in our compound might purchase their daily supplies. Fortunate it is for them that the friendly hen prospers in China, supplying eggs at less than a fifth of a cent apiece.

A jingle of bells warned me I must halt and leave room for other travelers coming down the broad road that cut mine at right angles—wayfarers from far Mongolia, constrained to stay here a little while and serve us. For as I stepped aside a long line of camels passed within, bearing many tons of coal—patient, deliberate laborers, who never go on a strike. I followed the last and soon observed a group of human burden bearers pulling a heavy roller over the new macadam walks, more than twenty men hitched together and moving in step to a rhythmical folk song. Over a little stream I passed by a sturdy stone bridge and saw men and women washing clothing by pounding it on the stones with other stones.

But the college bell was ringing and students were pouring out from the second period, young men and boys in dignified long garments of linen or pongee. More than three-quarters were without the queue that used to bind them to the past, for the faces of these students are eagerly turned to the future, with its many pressing and ofttimes perplexing problems. And so I resumed my interrupted task of guiding these youths of an ancient empire in their earnest study of the history of other nations and of the relations of the great past to the marvelous present.

Typical Scene in a Chinese Village Shopping District

Animals Independent of Water

Speaking of the extraordinary adaptation of plant and animal life to the arid conditions of Mexico, Carl Lumholtz says in his "New Trails in Mexico" (Scribner's) that even the domesticated animals of Indians and Mexicans subsist without difficulty for months without water. Whatever grows is adapted to the fierce heat of the summer and the scarcity of rain. With some plants their structure prevents loss of water, others have a means of storing water, which is the case with the cacti, the juicy pulp of which may save the thirsty traveler's life.

It has been found by actual experiment that small rodents of arid regions have been able to live for two or three years on hard seeds without water. The animals of the desert certainly impress one as having made themselves considerably independent of the water question. Holes or burrows in the ground indicating the presence of rodents or of the badger are often found in great numbers miles away from water, the only water being a lonely tinaja in a distant mountain range, of which it would seem strange that they should have any knowledge.

With the roving mountain sheep it is different, although Mexicans and Indians insist that they drink only when rain falls. Similarly, I have it on authority that while the white-tailed deer in eastern Sonora do, those in its western parts do not drink unless it rains, which is apt to be rarely.

Certain it is that the domesticated animals of arid regions are much more enduring than those of moister regions. Cattle live for months without any other water than that of the juice of the cacti, which is, besides, their principal means of subsistence. Even horses do not come in to drink of their own free will every day during the winter. In my travels it was the usual thing during the winter time for our animals to go without water every second day. On one occasion, in March, our horses and mules, traveling during the day, had no water for seventy-six hours. It was only the horses that suffered, and this was more from the quality of the water than from the lack of it. There is one domestic animal, however, the dog, that declines to adapt itself to desert conditions. Besides suffering from thirst, the hot soil makes its feet sore and it does not know on which leg to stand. Even the dogs of the Indians when traveling, especially in the hot season, remain behind panting in what little shade there may be under the bushes, and only continue their journey in the coolness of the evening.

When Indian Courage Failed

The late Quanah Parker, chief of the Comanche Indians, enjoyed the reputation, says Lippincott's, of being the wittiest man of his race. He was likewise a man of affairs and something of a lobbyist. He had appeared before the committee of Indian affairs regularly for years, and the members of that committee had become intimately acquainted with him.

Some years ago Uncle Sam issued a mandate to the effect that the Indians in the future should take unto themselves but one wife. Quanah, appearing before the committee, told its members that many of the men of his tribe had more than one wife. He was admonished to go home and tell them that this condition of affairs could no longer exist, and that the surplus wives must be sent home to their parents.

When Parker again appeared before the committee the following conversation took place between him and a committeeman:

"Did you tell your bucks that they must have but one wife, Parker?"

"Yes, me tell 'um," responded the Indian.

"Did they get rid of the extra wives?"

"Yes, all gone," answered the chief.

"But," urged the committeeman, "I am told that you, yourself, have six wives."

"Yes, me got six," said Parker.

"Now, this will not do, Parker. You have got to get rid of those extra wives. You go home and tell them to leave. Send them back to their parents. Tell them to go home."

"You tell 'um," responded the Indian.

A Commercial View of Vocational Education

The thought of today is strongly directed not merely toward efficiency in securing raw resources from the soil but also efficiency in manufacturing and in marketing both at home and abroad. The maintenance of such efficiency is to be secured only by recruiting from the younger generation those who are prepared for their life work.

Growing recognition of this fact has caused a persistent and widespread agitation in favor of vocational training as the best method of preparing boys and girls to take up this work. Any system of education which fails of such preparation is declared by many to be only partially successful. Culture for every child to the extent of his ability is, they say, his God-given right; the ability to do some one thing so well as to be able to make a living is a primary necessity of his life, and is also rapidly becoming a national necessity as well. The aim of education must be, therefore, declares The Nation's Business, to prepare each child for self-support and thus make every school of the nation a place for life preparation.

The greatness of America cannot always be accounted for by the accidents of location and opportunity. Indeed, if America is to continue to hold the position it now maintains as a commercial power, a new element must enter into the situation, for the twentieth century has brought us face to face with the fact that exhaustion threatens many of our resources. This saving element will be the practically trained boys and girls. Training to this end is the underlying idea of the Page bill relative to federal attention to practical education of children, and, it is also maintained, it is the underlying idea of every vocational attempt that is being made throughout the country.

Reminiscent of Whittier

As Old as Time

A little fellow who had just felt the hard side of a slipper turned to his mother for consolation. "Mother," he asked, "did grandpa thrash father when he was a little boy?"

"Yes," answered his mother, impressively.

"And did his father thrash him when he was little?"

"Yes."

"And did his father thrash him?"

"Yes."

A pause.

"Well, who started this thing, anyway?"

"Then your wife didn't enjoy her trip to Niagara?"

"No; the minute she saw that rushing water she began to wonder if she hadn't come away from home and left a faucet running."

Verses Old and New

HIS WAY

Love found me in the clear notes of a bird,
Soft, liquid, as they pierced the morning air—
And straight my lips repeated one dear word—
And lo! my trembling heart was bathed in prayer.

Love held me in the spell of sunset rays
All lingering gold upon the trees' young green,
In glinting glory of old woodland ways,
In murmuring music of clear brooks between.

Love charms me in the fragrance of a flower,
Its fragile form all wonder to my eyes;
Far fields of greenness whisper of Love's power,
From all outdoors fulfilling anthems rise.

Through all the shades of ways that are dividing,
Where I must choose God's way or take my own—
I look, and lo! his Love is beckoning, guiding,
And never, never can I go alone.

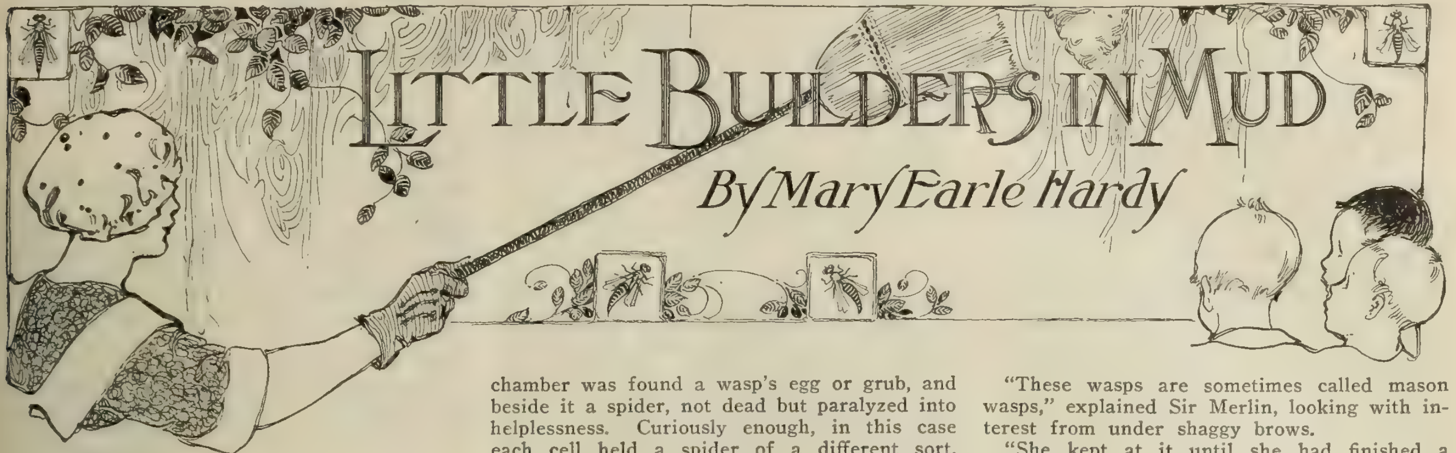
YOUNG AMERICA



LITTLE BUILDERS IN MUD

By Mary Earle Hardy

IN THE fragrance of a dewy morning a little king sat on the back steps of his castle making willow whistles. Three gallant knights he had for company. One was a merry minstrel. He could whistle like the wind when it blows into chimneys, he could sing like a troubadour and his laughter was like music. One was a dreamer of dreams, and in his dreams there were always arches and domes and towers. The third was likely to be a king himself some day.

Indeed, though true knighthood is enough for any man, all had noble kingdoms awaiting, which should be theirs as soon as they had conquered them.

Out onto the steps where the royal party sat making whistles burst a maid of honor from the castle hall. "Sure, it's the wasps that will be the death o' me!" she exclaimed; "and it's meself I shall see with both o' me eyes put out! Me tidy woodhouse is niver a place for wasps to be sticking their mud!" And in an instant the wasps' mud walls, the result of weeks of skillful and loving labor, were gone.

The young king picked up the broken wasp nest and carried it to the Merlin of his court, who was sitting on a balcony with other knights. With careful hands Sir Merlin took the pieces of clay and examined them closely. Little adobe dwellings he called them.

The little king and the three knights put their willow whistles in their pockets and, with the wise Sir Merlin to guide them, fell to studying the little dwellings and

"The black wasp's cunning way,
Mason of his walls of clay."

These dwellings, Sir Merlin showed, were little rooms whose doors were sealed, and in each room a baby wasp was lying. Beside the infant wasps lay food for time of need. Sir Merlin showed that these rooms were nurseries where baby wasps were kept from harm. As each cell was finished the mother wasp had laid her egg therein, and placed beside it provisions for the time when the baby wasp should arrive at an appetite.

Together Sir Merlin and the knights opened one door after another, and in every little chamber was found a wasp's egg or grub, and beside it a spider, not dead but paralyzed into helplessness. Curiously enough, in this case each cell held a spider of a different sort, and some were kinds that even the tutored eyes of the knights had never seen before. Had it only happened so, or was each of these wasp babies to be fed on different diet?

"I think I have heard it buzzed in a bee tree that all the bees were not to be fed alike," remarked a thoughtful knight.

Sir Merlin glanced quickly and with keen pleasure at the youth who had used his ears and eyes as he traveled through the king's forest. "Right true, Sir Knight," he answered. "You have come upon a goodly secret. It is true that food given to the grubs which are to develop into queen bees is different from that which is eaten by the ordinary grubs; and in the Fairyland of Bees common working grubs may be changed to princesses by giving them royal food."

But even the wise Sir Merlin could not tell whether the wasp mother had only chanced upon different kinds of spiders for each cell, or whether she felt a preference for some of her babies and, with far-seeing wisdom, planned that each should come out into the world fitted for a different station.

"Why aren't the spiders killed? And how were they made to lie so still?" inquired one interested knight.

"If the spiders were dead," replied Sir Merlin, "they would be unfit to eat before the baby wasps were hatched and ready for their breakfasts, so the little witch of a wasp with a single magic stroke"—he could not quite tell how—"made them powerless to move, and pushed them into the round towers."

"I've seen it done!" exclaimed the young knight who had dreams of domes and arches and towers. "One day I was watching a wasp build her house; I wanted to see how she shaped her cells and rounded her domes, and how she smoothed her walls. She flew to the river bank near by and there she worked in the clay she found, until she had moistened and kneaded enough to make a pretty big load for such a little builder. Then she carried it to the barn and fastened her bit of clay upon an old rafter, where she had begun a nest. After she had plastered it down and finished the cell, she smoothed and trimmed it, as I have seen a mason smooth and trim his mortar."

"These wasps are sometimes called mason wasps," explained Sir Merlin, looking with interest from under shaggy brows.

"She kept at it until she had finished a cell like one of these, joined to others, like the nest we have here," continued the knight. "Then she stood off and looked at her work on this side and on that, and acted well pleased with what she had done.

"I thought I had seen the thing through and went off. But in the afternoon, when I just gave her a call to see what she might be up to, I found her on the windowsill below where her nest was fastened. She was trying to carry a young miller up to the nest. The miller objected and fought as well as he was able. But Madam Wasp said he'd got to go; so she tugged one way and the miller pulled the other, flapping his wings till the wasp must have felt she was in a young whirlwind.

"After working for some time Madam Wasp apparently concluded it was too big a job, for she laid the miller down and I thought she was going to give up beaten; but that wasn't her plan. She just gave the miller a poke or a sting, I couldn't tell which, and it made her no more trouble.

"Again she started to fly up to her nest with her load, but the wind caught the wings of the miller and again I thought she was beaten. But she just laid the miller down and snipped off his wings; then, quite easily, she carried him away to her nest and crammed him into the cell she had made and sealed up the door. I have had some opinion of wasps since that time," concluded the young knight thoughtfully.

Just as he finished his story the maid of honor appeared again at the door. A look of dismay was upon her kind face.

"It's them wasps again!" she cried. "And sure, I niver dreamed that they had hearts in 'em, to grieve the like o' this!"

The royal party followed the maid of honor to the woodhouse, and there, upon the beam from which the little adobe dwelling had been torn, clung the mother wasp, evidently mourning for her home and family. Her wings were drooping, her head hung motionless. She was a picture of distress, and her sorrow could not be mistaken.

The young knights stood silent a moment. Then, "Whoever would have believed," said one thoughtfully, "that wasps have hearts!"

Some Queer Breakfast Guests in India

IF YOU think it's fun, boys and girls, to watch the antics of a few monkeys at the zoo, can you imagine anything funnier than a company of 300 monkeys? That's what you would have seen had you been in India with a writer for The Contra Costa Gazette.

This gentleman and his wife had just arrived at their new India home, and while his wife went in to change her traveling dress the servant laid the breakfast table on the veranda overlooking the river. At the clatter of the plates, writes he, there began to come down from the big tree that grew in the ravine behind it, from the house roof itself, from everywhere, a multitude of solemn monkeys. They took their places without noise or fuss on the veranda, and sat there, like an audience waiting for an entertainment to commence. When breakfast was ready I called my wife.

"Breakfast is ready, and they are all waiting," I cried.

"Who are waiting?" she asked in dismay. "I thought we were going to be alone, and I was just coming out in my dressing gown."

"Never mind," I said. "The people about here are not fashionably dressed themselves. They wear pretty much the same things all the year round."

And so my wife came out. Imagine her astonishment. In the midde of the veranda stood our breakfast table; and all the rest of the space, as well as the railings and the steps, was covered with an immense company, as motionless and silent as if they were stuffed. Only their eyes kept blinking and their little round ears kept twitching. Laughing heartily, at which the monkeys only looked all the graver, my wife sat down.

"Will they eat anything?" she asked.

"Try them," I said.

So she picked up a biscuit and threw it among the company. Three hundred monkeys jumped up in the air like one, and just for one instant there was a riot that defies description. The next instant every monkey was sitting in its place as solemn and serious as if it had never moved. Only their eyes winked and their ears twitched.

My wife threw them another biscuit, and again the riot, and then another and another and another. But at length we had given away all that we had to give, and got up to go. The monkeys at once rose, every monkey on the veranda, and, advancing gravely to the steps, walked down them in a solemn procession, old and young together, and dispersed for the day's occupation.

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 12:1-42. Golden Text, Matthew 20:28: The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.

This lesson marks an end and a beginning. The plagues had almost reached their climax. Pharaoh's heart had been tossed into the furnace only to grow harder from the fires. His better resolutions had no permanency in them. They came with the plagues, and with the plagues they departed. In this respect he remains as a type for all the ages. Character should rise superior to circumstance, but often instead circumstance brings a revelation of character. The king may have been sincere in his promises when they were given, but he ultimately weakened. There was no change in his nature. His stony heart remained the same, save that it grew more and more rebellious against the will of God.

Will of God in Conflict with Pharaoh's Own Interests

Pharaoh's sin was selfishness. He refused to let Israel go because it seemed against his interest. Two million serfs more or less he regarded as essential to the prosperity of his kingdom. Cities were to be built and vast public schemes no doubt entered into his plans for the future. These he could not abandon. God might demand a greater service out in the wilderness, but between God and himself he had but one choice. Selfishness makes no concession. The sin is common. Many regard it as the ancestor of every other sin.

Pharaoh was selfish and the nine plagues failed to change his nature. There remained but one more test. The climax was not distant. So far the king had been a comparative observer of the troubles that afflicted his people. The skies might rain hail and the rivers run blood, but neither touched the center of his life. His home remained sacred. One can easily meet adversity when it comes no nearer than did the nine plagues to Pharaoh. Ruin and suffering were rife, but his home had been spared. Things are never so bad but they might be worse. No one over whose threshold the shadow has not fallen and whose doorknob death's skeleton hand has never turned has any right to complain. But the final warning came, and God said unto Moses, "I will go through the land of Egypt . . . and will smite all the firstborn in the land of Egypt." God never comes so near as when he steps upon the grave of the firstborn. Friends call and assure us that all is well. They point us upward toward God. But their lifeline does not reach beyond the surf. There are depths about which they know nothing.

Egypt Brought Low by the Smiting of Its Firstborn

Pharaoh was human and so were his subjects. That night of death all stood upon the same plane. And a cry went up such as never had been heard before. It was the cry of a nation sorrowing for its dead. From the king in his palace to the captive in the dungeon there went up a moan like the dirge of the sea. But no night is entirely bereft of its stars. There were a few homes in Egypt over which the angel had passed on his mission of death. These were the homes of the Israelites.

Great blessings are the response to great necessities, and that night was instituted a service which under varying forms remains still. It was in strict accordance with the instructions of God. The elders of Israel were to prepare a lamb for sacrifice and sprinkle its blood upon the doorposts of the houses, that the destroying angel might see and pass them by. This lamb was an emblem of the Christ. It was to be a male of the first year, without blemish, the best of the flock. From those rude huts in far off Egypt was flung forward a shadow that rested upon the cross. Every requisite of salvation was involved in that service. The lamb itself was spotless and in its blood the people found their only safety against death. It was the gospel in drama. There was faith, profession and life. Faith lies in unquestioned obedience; the blood on the doorposts was a public confession and the girded loins indicated a readiness to enter upon a new life. No one can respond to the spirit of these requirements and remain longer in the slavery of sin. No better counsel than this can be given to the communicant retiring from the Lord's table: "Rise up, get you forth . . . serve Jehovah as ye have said."

The Law of God Replaces Domination of Pharaoh

There was a "mixed multitude" then, as there ever must be. Some, it is possible, may have gone back, and others no doubt fell by the wayside, but the drift and trend was toward a better living. The domination of Pharaoh was at an end and in its place came the law of God. The service was to remain as a memorial throughout all the generations. Forms change, but the lessons of that first supper are as everlasting as truth. The people partook of the sacrifice before their departure, just as we partake of the bread that symbolizes the body of Christ. Nothing can be accepted in his stead. That one idea has led the church through all the ages. One may be ignorant of much, but the Lamb slain is the saving intelligence of the race. The miracles of Egypt live not so much in the ten plagues as in this one blessing; not the blood upon the waters of the Nile, but in the blood upon the doorposts of Israel. One at length disappeared, but the other still remains. The tides of time for over thirty centuries have beaten against it, but there it stands, clear and so plain that, like the destroying angel, the world can see it in the dark. It is the miracle of history, and in its meaning lies the hope of man.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Israel begins a national career from the date of the Exodus. The deliverance of Israel is a signal instance of divine interposition, for Israel was a slave and the Pharaoh the most powerful sovereign of the then known world. That it might never be forgotten, the day of deliverance was made a national holiday.

Happy is the nation which can date its dirth from some interposition of Providence. It was fit that the beginning of Israel's history as a people, "free and independent," should be accompanied by wonders of divine grace. In the last lesson we saw how God broke the strength of kings to emancipate his chosen people. The whole history of the Jew is a history of weakness triumphing over might that right might stand. It is the story of God "keeping watch above his own." If we were to consider Israel's history as beginning with the Exodus and as closed with the fall of Jerusalem, we might think the result hardly worth the toil, the suffering, the miracles. But if we see in it only the preparation for the kingdom of heaven on earth, we can understand the movement. Henry Cabot Lodge says that without a final moral purpose there is no history, nothing but "unconnected annals." Given a divine purpose, an end toward which events march, and history for the first time becomes possible.

It would be a sorry day for the Jew were he ever to forget the marvels by which he was freed. It would be a sorry day for America were we to ignore the moral, the religious, the Christian purpose which actuated the Pilgrims. They were by no means the first white settlers who made America their home. But they were the first white settlers who made a home for the Christian religion in the wilderness, and they prospered so that they are commonly spoken of as the "fathers" of the republic. Their aim, their ideals, their "divine intent" separated them from the commercial and political pioneers who preceded and followed them. The study of Israel means more to Americans than it can to any other nation now living because our own history repeats theirs in so many respects.

Israel a Holy Nation, Under Divine Protection from the First

Verse 21—The exodus was not a mere accident of war, a triumph of diplomacy or an experiment in democracy. It was a religious act. It must be marked by sacrificial observances. It should be written in blood, as all most sacred and solemn covenants in the East invariably were. The most innocent victim and the choicest food were found in the lamb of the flock. The passover lamb became thus the fit symbol of that Lamb slain for us, who was without sin and whose flesh is meat indeed (John 6:53).

Verse 22—Salvation is always a matter of man's cooperation with the divine intent. God saved, but man marked the doorposts with the sign of faith. The ritual was by no means new. It was indeed the better understood because old. It signified the consecration of the marked object to the deity worshiped. The homes marked with the blood of this sacrifice became God's in a special sense. The family were to remain within, possibly for two reasons —one to show they felt it an hour of divine interposition, and one to show that man had no direct part in the act of judgment.

Verse 23—In times when a city is occupied by a conqueror it is customary for the inhabitants to mark the homes of those friendly to the cause triumphant.

Israel Shows Gratitude by Remembrance of This Night

Verse 24—It is a sign of moral decadence when the sons forget or ignore the goodness of God to their fathers. Family life flows in a sluggish current where family anniversaries are not observed. The decadence of the annual Thanksgiving feast with us is a thing not to be passed by with indifference. The nation will lose something of its love for liberty when it neglects Memorial Day and the Fourth of July.

Verse 25—The passover, with its simple rites, would doubtless seem very "old-fashioned" to degenerate Judean courts. The Puritan has become a jest to many a prodigal son of deeply religious ancestors. But the law which made the memorial a perpetual feast was one founded upon a good knowledge of human nature and a clear understanding of human motives.

Verse 26—Religious rites are object lessons for inquiring minds. Before the child can understand a book he can understand a devotional act. He is sure to ask when he is permitted to see.

Verse 27—And in the explanation made by the Hebrew father to his inquiring child there was a fine opportunity to inculcate reverence for the God of his ancestors, gratitude for divine interposition and that humility which ascribes to God alone the course of events so unexpectedly wrought out. The passover hymn was to be not a pean of national success but a "Non nobis Domine" psalm (Ps. 115:1), an ascription of praise to Jehovah as the sole Deliverer of the nation in its hour of peril.

Israel a Saved Nation Because an Obedient Nation

Verse 28—The few who survived the sinking of the Titanic speak with admiration of the tacit obedience which the vast multitude of passengers rendered the commands of the ship's officers. There was no rebellion against authority. Even the commands which sealed the fate of hundreds were obeyed to the letter and without hesitation. The Israelites had begun to realize that their only deliverance lay in God. They did "as the Lord commanded Moses." He had no need to repeat his command, much less to contend for its enforcement.

Verse 29—The penalty inflicted was terrible, but not so cruel as the crimes which had evoked it. There are people who will move heaven and earth to save a man guilty of parricide or uxoricide, or even of the extermination of his whole family. There are critics of the Bible who would spare the Egyptian even though he had put to death every male child of the Hebrews (Ex. 1:16-22).

Verse 30-31—The remedy was severe but effectual. Israel did not need to fight its way to the sea. In our own day we shall doubtless see how such a sweeping disaster effects reforms otherwise never to be wrought, for, humbled by his defeats in the field, the Turk may now accord to his Christian serfs and subjects those natural rights for which they have begged in vain. Not until "He hath loosed the fateful lightning of his terrible swift sword" is Pharaoh brought to accord that justice which the slave is unable to win for himself. War may be "the last reason of kings," but is the only reason kings like Pharaoh can understand.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning August 3, 1913

FOREIGN MISSION TOPIC—Outlook for the coming year.

Our subject for this week calls for an outlook upon the whole field of Christian missions as it lies before our Foreign Board.

Japan. During the past year considerable progress has been made in the public recognition of Christianity as one of the great uplifting forces of the empire. It is a religion which was at first persecuted, and then merely tolerated, but now is explicitly recognized as being no longer a foreign religion, whose principles are scarcely consistent with a whole-hearted loyalty to the national government, but a faith which is now an integral part of the higher life of modern Japan. It must be a profound satisfaction that the Japanese churches are themselves raising up theologians and apologetes able to face the problems of the new syncretism.

There is pressed upon us the need of doing something more to reach the educated classes of Japan. The struggle in the new Japan is not between Christianity and the old religions but between Christianity and a scientific agnosticism. In consequence of this fact the question of the foundation of a great Christian university is now occupying the minds of Christian leaders.

The Japanese New Testament is now being revised by a committee consisting of four Japanese and four foreigners. It is hoped that the new version may appear within the coming year.

In Korea, in spite of official opposition, the church has continued to make progress. But Japanese occupation has thrust new problems and new distractions upon the Christian community. The church has no longer the undivided interest of her members. Commerce, industry and politics are creating centrifugal attractions.

The erection of the new republic in China is an event unparalleled in human history. There has not been another political movement that has so profoundly affected the life and destiny of so large a number of people. It is strange that this opportunity has evoked so little interest in the minds of the Christian people. One year ago the General Assembly of our church directed the board to send 100 new missionaries to China within three years. It is a pity that all the churches of Christendom could not have taken similar action.

The rapacity of the great powers in their money deals with China has embittered the minds of multitudes of thoughtful Chinese against western nations. Let us thank God that America was not a party to this deal. The greatest missionary opportunity now belongs to the United States; for China trusts us. And China wants western learning. The desire for our knowledge and the power our knowledge confers should be met by Christian schools and the preparation of Christian literature.

Philippines. Our missionaries are using the desire of the Filipinos for independence to impress upon them the necessity of the qualities of self-control and stability, in order that some day they may be able to govern themselves.

Siam and Laos. These missions have had a quiet, prosperous year. The salient feature of the work of the Laos mission has been the discovery of large, unreached Laos-speaking populations in the French Laos country and in Southwestern China. A new station will be opened in French territory east of the Mekong river.

India. An important feature of the closing year has been the rapid disappearance of the spirit of unrest and sedition which formerly caused so much concern to the British authorities. This has been brought about chiefly through the visit of King George and Queen Mary and their coronation at Dehli. Also, the Indian people have been given a larger part in the government of the land. Christianity is now making the greatest progress in the history of Indian missions.

Syria and Persia. It has been a year of disastrous war for Turkey, first with Italy over Tripoli, then with the Balkan allies. For a time there seemed to be danger threatening the Christian missionaries because of Turkey's manifest desire to provoke foreign intervention. The easiest way to induce the foreign powers to interfere seemed to be that of permitting the massacre of some resident foreigners, preferably missionaries. But this danger has passed. Amid all the political turmoil the missions have quietly continued their work of healing and teaching.

The probable effects of the war upon the future of Christianity may be briefly summarized. Several provinces have been freed from Turkish bondage; and in these territories the work of the Christian missionary will no longer be subject to the restraints of Moslem tyranny. Moreover, any great event which breaks up the ordinary conventionalities of life and forces people to face new conditions necessitates fresh thought and is favorable to liberalizing tendencies. If Moslems do not ask questions they will not become Christians. When they begin to question they are at least more accessible. And, finally, the Mohammedan world has had an unexpected demonstration of the superiority of Christian methods and Christian courage.

Persia has been quiet under the political transfer of the northern section of the country to Russia. The inevitable has been accepted. Russian influence has been tranquilizing, and there is more intellectual inquiry and religious tolerance than formerly.

Africa. The West African mission is full of promise. From the very beginning it has emphasized the importance of self-support. Year by year it gains in evangelistic fervor, knowledge of the truth and practical usefulness. The one possible menace arises from the activity of the Mohammedan missionaries in Africa, who have thus far left this field undisturbed, but now threaten it on the north.

Latin America. The work in Latin-American countries is in a special class of foreign missions, because here the propaganda is directed not against non-Christian religions, but against a debased form of Christianity. With the more intimate intercourse between the two parts of this continent, the need of Protestant missions becomes the more insistent. While these countries are nominally Roman Catholic, a majority of the 71,000,000 inhabitants are agnostics and unbelievers. The moral condition of these peoples defies detailed description. The great need of the people is the gospel; and, subsidiary to this, schools, colleges and Christian literature. This year the board has sent to the field eighty-nine new missionaries. These fill the places left vacant by deaths and resignations and add sixty-three to the missionary force of the church.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

August 10, 1913

GREAT FIGHTERS IN THE NEW WAR

TOPIC—Heroes and heroines of the temperance cause. Daniel 1:8-17.

There is much talk of temperance waves, and temperance movements, but it is not to be forgotten that behind all moods and manifestations of this sort there are flesh-and-blood men and women. If our day is one of victory for temperance, the cause may be found in men and women who gave themselves through weary years to espousing an unpopular propaganda.

The most effective servant of the temperance cause is the woman or man who teaches a boy or girl to abstain from strong drink, and to oppose the liquor traffic.

A generation ago it scarcely hurt a public man to be known as one who used liquor to excess. Now it has become a disgrace for any man, in public or in private, to be known as a hard drinker. Once the abstemiousness of a "cold-water fanatic" was sneered at; now such a reputation is one which every candidate for popular suffrage covets.

Wars are won by private soldiers. The strength of the commanding officer is the number and character of the men in the ranks. The most effective servants of the temperance cause are the plain people, of conviction and altruistic passion, who have not enjoyed the applause which comes to public speakers nor had the distinction of office holding, but who, in multiform ways, and most of all by example, have consistently fought this great curse of our civilization. The first quality of sincere devotion to any cause is willingness to merge one's self and labors in the general prosperity of the enterprise. Measured by this standard, the heroes and heroines of temperance have been legion. We see mothers and teachers, in countless host, leading the van.

For a boy or a young man to come into touch with a great woman is to receive a priceless treasure of chivalry. Frances Willard had this effect upon legions. Her personality touched with inspiration countless lives, especially of young men. To know her was to believe in the idealism of womanhood. It would be a blessed thing if this inspirational quality could be shared by all women, for she made knights errant of men.

Tongue, pen and ballot are the weapons that will win the new temperance war.

All who look beneath the surface of things see a new formidableness in the temperance movement because it has become one with the whole vast and irresistible struggle for social welfare. More dispassionate than the old crusaders, and wielding new forces of scientific knowledge, the present day sociologist is condemning intemperance because it is an antisocial force. It hurts the common good. It is of a piece with vile tenements, sweatshops, child labor and white slavery. The inexorable social surveys, with their relentless facts, are proving anew the case against the saloon—that it is linked up with crime and poverty, and that it is wholly uneconomic, wasting both the money and the physical vitality of its patron. If the day's program of social amelioration is to win, and no observing person doubts this, then the saloon is doomed. So we should add to the roll of the noble servants of temperance all social reformers, and their number is legion.

Self-denial is the first characteristic of heroism. He who disregards his own taste and comfort for another's sake belongs in the ranks of temperance heroes.

The church, too, has swung into line for the temperance cause. In the United States the most effective of all temperance agencies has come to be the Anti-Saloon League, which is a league of the churches, having no life apart from the churches. It has repeatedly demonstrated that when the churches of any community are united and aroused they are irresistible. Ultimately all moral battles are up to the church. When the temperance cause is made whole-heartedly her cause, then its victory will be complete and abiding.

There is one man who is seldom called a hero, and whose struggles are too often counted fair game for the humorists. This is the victim of an appetite for strong drink, who yet withstands the temptation. In all the wide realm of temperance there is no braver, nobler figure than the person who resists this fiery craving for alcohol.

Slowly, but with ever-increasing certainty and rapidity, we are building a better social order, free from all that hurts and hinders life. It is now entirely conceivable that there can be a human society like that prophesied by the ancient Hebrew seers. When it becomes a reality all the world, a world uncontaminated by alcohol, will inherit the labors and sacrifices of all who have served the cause of temperance and human welfare.

NEW BOOKS

Bergson's Philosophic Method

An Introduction to Metaphysics, by Henri Bergson, translated by T. E. Hulme. This authorized translation of what constitutes a foundation stone of M. Bergson's system is not only an aid to the full appreciation of his later works, but it might have been written after them expressly to answer the objection to his philosophy that it places a rather feminine thing called "intuition" above intellect as an instrument of philosophical research and the discovery of truth.

In this book Bergson tells just what he means by intuition and how it works, although he does not here make that intimate connection between intuition in us and instinct in the insects that he does in his "Creative Evolution." Here he briefly considers the action of the mind in knowing, and shows how it represents things in a geometrical manner; how it has evolved categories such as "one" and "many," into which all phenomena must be fitted just as one would class all birds in genera; how it then takes the genera, the universal concepts, for the reality, instead of taking the living birds—no one of which had ever quite completely fitted into the genus—and philosophizes by juggling those terms.

Now intuition, says M. Bergson, is simply an intellectual sympathy by which we come into contact with the real, the individual and the basic factors in things that concern life. It is not a substitute for intellect. For intellect was especially evolved to deal with matter and all that, by virtue of its inert character, is susceptible of division and recombination. It would be folly to solve a problem in arithmetic by intuition, because the same intellect that gives us the answer has made the categories of number that have in themselves the answer waiting to be drawn out, so that here the intellect is in its own sphere. And as all our living problems are immersed in and manifested through matter, we must not long neglect those manifestations before bringing intuition to bear.

To solve any philosophical problem we must first attain an intimate intellectual familiarity with it, a familiarity that takes in every fact and so neutralizes every prejudice. Only then, by this plunge of the mind which is too swift to be caught and explained as logical intellection, does our sympathy with life give us the answer to our question. It is not a philosophic method which despises science; it is not a philosophic method that the ignorant and the charlatan can use; but it is a philosophic method which life itself imposes. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. 75 cents net.

General Theological Topics

The Theology of the Gospels, by James Moffatt, appears in the "Studies in Theology" series, its contents having been delivered in the form of lectures under the Alexander Robertson Trust in the University of Glasgow during 1912. Dr. Moffatt's basis for study is the narrow field of the four gospels. To the question, Is there a theology of the gospels distinct from the rest of the New Testament? he answers in the affirmative. After dealing with certain other preliminary matters, he takes up the question of the eschatological point of view and presents the content of the theology of the gospels under the captions of "The God of Jesus," "The Person of Jesus" and "The Spirit of Jesus." Those who are familiar with the customary treatment of New Testament theology will naturally be struck by the originality, if not the novelty, of this method. To some it will probably appear open to the charge of artificiality and extraneous dogmatic influence induced by the author's trinitarianism. But, whatever may be thought of the method of treatment, no one will complain of dullness in Dr. Moffatt's style. Of special value in view of current discussions on this subject is the acutely discriminating refutation of the new eschatological interpretation of the teaching of Jesus. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. 75 cents net.

Our Growing Creed, by William D. McLaren of Melbourne, will come as a surprise to those who have supposed that doctrinal teaching was out of date. This imposing volume is a history of Christian doctrine written from the evangelical standpoint, but with a distinct recognition of the fact that light has been breaking out of the word in each age, and that as the spiritual nature has been refined it has demanded not a new gospel but a larger understanding of the old one. The book will be welcomed by all devout students, though all may not agree with some of its conclusions. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Schleiermacher, by W. B. Selbie. This is the first of a series of volumes under the general title of "The Great Christian Theologies," edited by Henry W. Clark. The importance of Schleiermacher in the history of theology can scarcely be overestimated. Although even in Germany his own writings are perhaps less read today than a generation or so ago, his influence is more profoundly felt today than ever. His protest against the rationalism prevalent in his own day, his frank adoption of the critical method in theology and his effective appeal to the experience of the Christian have remained permanent features of theological thinking. Dr. Selbie approaches this father of modern theology with sympathy and discrimination. He thoroughly appreciates the value of Schleiermacher's method, and at the same time sees the defects and failures that necessarily accompany the first effort of theological construction upon the new basis. The pantheistic tendencies of Schleiermacher, his inconsistent use of the theory of human freedom and his inadequate interpretation of such biblical notions as justification and reconciliation are quite clearly criticised. But on the other hand, the fervor and enthusiasm he infused into theological discussion and the strength which, as a consequence, he imparted to the religious life as a whole are duly acknowledged. Among the unfortunately few monographs on Schleiermacher in the English language this volume will undoubtedly occupy the first place. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York.

The Spiritual Body in Relation to the Divine Law of Life, by G. H. Peeke. This little volume is a vigorous protest against the materialistic interpretation of the New Testament expressions regarding the resurrection. The author argues from the scientific and philosophical, as well as from the exegetical-historical, side of the case that this is a gross misconception, and in doing so he brings into view facts of importance frequently left out of consideration. Nevertheless in his zeal to lay stress on the spiritual side of the resurrection he evidently loses sight of certain other facts that must be accounted for. His theory therefore must be considerably modified before it can be accepted. [Richard G. Badger, Boston. $1.50 net.

The Rule of Faith, by W. P. Paterson. This volume contains the lectures delivered by Professor Paterson in 1905 on the Baird Foundation under the title of "The Substance and Standards of Christian Doctrine." The author has during the past seven years enlarged, revised and amended what was prepared for the Baird Foundation and has abbreviated the title as above. As it stands, therefore, the volume has become in a certain sense a historical treatise introductory to dogmatic theology. It is divided into two main sections. In the first the author distinguishes between the various viewpoints occupied by present-day Christian theologies. Of these he recognizes six, namely, that of the Roman Catholic Church, that of generic protestantism, that of "the school of the Spirit," that of the rationalists, that of "the Christian experience" and that of biblical eclecticism. This enumeration is perhaps sufficient to show the breadth and comprehensiveness of the author's effort to introduce the student to the great Christian systems. The second part is entitled "The Substance of Doctrine," and aims to expound the systems developed from the points of view characterized in the first part. This section is particularly rich in historical sidelights. Professor Paterson is a careful thinker, well versed in the history of philosophy as well as of theology. And, although his own doctrinal views are strictly evangelical, he treats all differing systems with the utmost sympathy and discrimination, recognizing in each the essential Christian and evangelical elements and giving grounds for his dissent from them. Altogether the volume is one of the most permanently valuable in the domain of theology that has appeared in many years. [George H. Doran Company, New York.

Behind the Curtain, by L'Abbe de la Croix, is a book of criticisms and suggestions offered to the Roman Catholic Church by one of its ministers. He evidently bespeaks his ideas with great frankness. Among Protestants he would be readily recognized as a Roman Catholic modernist. He believes in a Zeitgeist; he believes that the Roman Catholic Church is failing to put itself in touch with the times; he is eager that this should be done, and with this end in view offers his suggestions. His boldness is certainly astonishing, and whether he expects practical results from his publication it is difficult to know. To the Protestant Christian leader, however, his book offers the interest of a broad-minded view of some of the weaknesses of Roman Catholicism. [Seemore Company, Chicago. $1.

Historical Christianity

Bible Reading in the Early Church, by Adolf Harnack; translated by J. R. Wilkinson. (New Testament Series, Vol. V.) In an essay characteristic of his style and method the premier of church historians investigates the use of the Bible in the ancient Christian world. His main contributions to the knowledge of the subject are: 1. That the Bible was read by the laity freely and universally, and not, as the Roman Catholic Church authorities maintain, only by monks and clergy. 2. If the Bible was not a secret book, but accessible to all, the Christian religion was not "a mystery religion," with the sacraments as its central feature. It was a free religion of thought and life, and the sacraments were adopted into it first as means toward the promotion of the spiritual life, and only later developed into mystery features. The little volume, which, like its predecessors in the New Testament series, appears in the Crown Theological Library, is a typical specimen of splendidly original work in an interesting field. [G. Primitive Christianity and Its Non-Jewish Sources, by Carl Clemen; translated by Robert G. Nisbet. The science of comparative religion has been busied for a generation more or less with the problem of the relationship of biblical religion to the religions of non-biblical races and countries. The science of comparative religion is as yet scarcely beyond its infancy. Its methods have thus far been variable, its processes experimental and its results for the most part doubtful. Nevertheless it has succeeded in placing some aspects of religious life and thought into clearer light, and in bringing into view the affiliations between similar practices and beliefs among different peoples. It was quite an ambitious task to gather up results achieved fragmentarily on different subordinate subjects by scholars widely scattered through Europe and America and to unify them into a single system. This is what Professor Clemen has undertaken to do. In his introductory chapter he enumerates and describes in brief single-sentence notices the works which he has laid under contribution. A careful examination of this chapter fills one with astonishment at the omnivorous erudition of the author. It is not, however, a mere enumeration of titles of books, but a discriminating use of sources that one has to deal with. As to the question of indebtedness on the part of Christianity and Judaism to the gentile faiths Professor Clemen is somewhat skeptical. He admits that some features of biblical religion were derived from extra-biblical sources, but the claim made by many in behalf of the substance and bulk of the Bible he proves to be unsubstantiated. PROTESTANTISM AND PROGRESS, by Ernst Troeltsch; translated by W. Montgomery. The subsidiary title of this volume, which is incorporated in the Crown Theological Library, gives its key and reads, "A Historical Study of the Relation of Protestantism to the Modern World." The author defines what he means by the modern world and by Protestantism, and then proceeds to show the points of contact and of contrast between the two. His object in doing so is to utilize the history of modern culture as a means for solving the practical problems of present-day Christian life. Dr. Troeltsch is well known as one of the leading philosophical thinkers of Germany and his words deserve, and will no doubt secure, careful consideration. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

The Old Testament

THE CHRISTIAN VIEW OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, by Frederick Karl Eiselen. It is perhaps less necessary today than it was ten years ago to enter a plea in behalf of the careful critical study of the problems connected with the composition of the Old Testament. Discussions of the subject given to the public in recent years have made it very clear that, aside from that kind of criticism which has a tendency to undermine faith in the divine element in the Bible, there is also a higher criticism which strengthens and confirms that faith. Professor Eiselen sets himself to the task of showing how the work of criticism has resulted in placing the Old Testament in its true light, freeing it from unnecessary entanglements with erroneous tradition and giving its several parts their true values. While the work is not strictly a controversial one, its undisguised sympathy with the critical attitude may naturally arouse the suspicion of those who prefer to leave the traditional views undisturbed. But on the other hand its devout spirit, its sincere acceptance of the idea of a divine revelation through the Old Testament, and its temperate tone will commend it as a fair and honest effort to advance the truth. [Eaton and Mains, New York. $1 net.

PENTATEUCHAL STUDIES, by Harold M. Wiener. Mr. Wiener, who is a barrister at law in London and apparently an orthodox Jew, has undertaken to demolish the now prevalent higher critical view of the Old Testament. His special point of attack is the Wellhausen theory of the origin of the Pentateuch. Mr. Wiener believes that the critical theory can be destroyed by an appeal to the text of the Old Testament as it was before the formation of the Massora. In order to reach this text, however, he is forced to resort to conjecture. Conjecture used moderately is helpful, but in such a measure as used here it becomes a worse peril than the evil that Mr. Wiener would cure. The volume is a collection of loosely attached and in some cases irrelevant papers. [Bibliotheca Company, Oberlin, Ohio. $2.15 net.

THE ETHICS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, by Hinckley G. Mitchell. Professor Mitchell undertakes a rather difficult task. It was simple enough in the days when the Old Testament was used as a uniform source of information on all sorts of subjects, secular as well as spiritual, to construct out of its separate statements theories of astronomy, geology, politics and ethics. But Professor Mitchell is not willing to use the Old Testament upon any such presuppositions. He is obliged, therefore, to separate and classify its books according to dates and settings fixed for them by a thoroughgoing criticism. He then endeavors to deduce from each book the moral and social practice reflected in it, as well as ideas of morality held valid and authoritative when it was produced. Since in many cases the sources at his command are meager and fragmentary, and since in most cases criticism cannot pronounce a decisive verdict on the dates of the documents and on their relations to one another, Professor Mitchell is necessarily forced to resort to conjecture and to set forth as settled facts opinions that can only have the validity of guesswork. Moreover, he is not quite faithful to the title of the book, which suggests that he was aiming to construct a system of ethics, whereas, for the most part, his volume is a record of the practical morals of the Jews during the successive ages of their national life as recorded in the Old Testament. The New Testament

A CRITICAL AND EXEGETICAL COMMENTARY ON THE JOHANNINE EPISTLES, by A. E. Brook. This volume in the "International Critical Commentary" on the three minor books of the New Testament bearing the name of John follows in its general lines the plan of the series, though in one point the author departs from the models placed before him by his predecessors. He deliberately avoids the question of authorship on the ground that "it cannot be profitably discussed apart from the wider question of the date and authorship of the fourth gospel." While he is right as to the impossibility of disentangling the author of the epistles of John from that of the gospel, it is not so clear that the question of authorship could not have been presented in a general summary. At all events, a gap is left which the scholarly student will wish had been filled somehow or other. The notes are abundantly illuminative of these somewhat neglected writings, and yet one feels that too much attention has been given to the subordinate matter of the condition of the text and of textual readings. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $3.

GALATIANS AND ROMANS, with Introduction and Notes, by W. Douglas Mackenzie. This tenth volume completes the series of commentaries by modern scholars issued under the title of "The Westminster New Testament." The series as a whole is characterized by brevity, clearness and trustworthy scholarship. Biblical commentaries had come to assume burdensome proportions and the Westminster New Testament is a reaction toward greater simplicity, conforming more closely to modern pedagogical requirements. Dr. Mackenzie's contribution to it in this volume rises to the best models set him by his predecessors in the series. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 75 cents net.

ST. PAUL, by Adolf Deissmann; translated by Lionel R. N. Strachan. Dr. Deissmann, already well known among New Testament students as a philologist of the first rank, undertakes to rescue the life of Paul from hard and fast methods of approach and place it upon a freer and more natural ground. He believes that the conventional way of deducing a theology of Paul from his writings does not yield satisfactory results, and must be set aside in favor of a thorough comprehension of the world in which the apostle lived. Since this world is substantially the same today as in Paul's time, the author undertook a series of journeys into it and endeavored so to identify himself with it as to find Paul's bearings and breathe his social as well as his physical atmosphere. Out of the knowledge thus obtained he believes he has gained a better facility for reconstructing the apostle's social and religious life. He has, however, evidently underestimated the amount of work done in this direction by a line of eminent predecessors, and is inclined therefore to speak almost contemptuously of existing interpretations of Paul. On the other hand, Dr. Deissmann has made a considerable advance in the understanding of Paul and deserves the credit of revivifying the human personality of the great apostle and adding vastly to the interest of all future study of him. THE GREAT TEXTS OF THE BIBLE, edited by James Hastings. St. James, XIII-XXI; James to Jude. In these two volumes Dr. Hastings gives us another installment of the unique work of which eight volumes have already been issued. In plan and matter this work is like no other. It does not aim to be a consecutive and exhaustive commentary on the biblical texts; but its plan involves the selection of the most fruitful expressions in the Holy Scriptures and the homiletical exposition of their contents, with illustrative selections from the writings of those who have treated them, as well as of others who have discussed kindred thoughts. Dr. Hastings's experience, both as pastor and as editor of The Expository Times and of Bible dictionaries, gives him a skill in this kind of work that ministers as a class will wish to utilize. The Education of the Young

A PLEA FOR THE YOUNGER GENERATION, by Cosmo Hamilton (George H. "Bradford Horton" in Book Form

Long before serial publication in The Continent of "Bradford Horton, Man" had approached the closing stage the editors had been receiving letters inquiring when and by whom the story would be published in book form. Few serials appearing in The Continent have had so strong an appeal, and those readers who have followed the fortunes of the sturdy young hero from week to week need no further description to assure them that the story is well worth owning and rereading in its new and permanent form. To others the recommendation of so discriminating a body of people as the readers of The Continent is a guaranty. Unquestionably, Bradford Horton is Dr. Holmes's greatest creation in fiction. There is sufficient of the romantic in the hero's career to lift it far above the commonplace, and yet he is left so perfectly human that his reality is never put in conscious doubt. In the pathos that occasionally shows itself, and in the seriousness that lies beneath the youthful bravado of the hero, there is the appeal of sincerity demanded of the writer who seeks to hold before us the mirror of life, material and spiritual; and the relieving humor is always wholesome and kindly. No manlier man than Richard S. Holmes ever lived; and Bradford Horton, though not intended to be in all points perfect, stands in fiction as a creation worthy of such a man. The book is well printed and attractively bound, and will please all who have desired to possess the story. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25 net.

MISSIONARY WORK

Revolting Against Caste in India

In India there is a tendency for congresses and conferences to draw up resolution after resolution of reform and then depart without following these up with action. Yet the mental attitude of the modern Hindu leaders can be ascertained by the findings of such meetings. At the second Bombay provincial social conference held this year in Ahmednabad the president, Mr. Divati, is reported by The Indian Social Reformer as having uttered several startling ideas.

"It is caste, with its played-out restrictions, that is in the way of adult marriages, marriage by well guided choice, remarriage of widows, improvement of marriage laws, foreign travel, restriction of expenditure at weddings and death ceremonies, and the elevation of the depressed classes; for it either penalizes acts directed toward reform under these heads, or interposes its unaccommodating rules between its members and their freedom in the matter of reform under other heads." It is a helpful sign that there is an awakening concerning the wrongs of centuries.

Devils Instead of Chopsticks

Some of the difficulties which new missionaries have with the Chinese language are often amusing. Recently a new reading room was to be opened in Nanhsuchow, in the province of Anhwei, and an elaborate celebration was planned. Owing to the difficulty in securing a speaker for the occasion, however, the date was uncertain. Finally word came that one could be there on the following day to give the opening lecture. When this word was received it was after 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and all preparations had to be made and invitations sent out that evening. The heads of the different schools, teachers from the city, members of the chamber of commerce and some political clubs were called hastily together to plan for the event. Refreshments were served to these guests in the evening in the form of Chinese candies and cakes, but it was discovered at the last moment that someone had failed to provide chopsticks with which to eat the dainties. The attention of one of the hosts was called to the omission, and he immediately went to the gateman and told him to go out and buy some. The gateman was a rather stupid Chinaman, so after two or three attempts to make him understand—all of which were met with a blank stare—the missionary called another man. But this man was equally blank. The missionary thought it was queer that he had found two men who didn't know what their countrymen used to eat with, so finally he went to one of the inmates of the compound. Then the laugh was on the new missionary. He had been asking the men to buy devils instead of chopsticks. And he adds, in telling the story, "It was some minutes before the fellow could straighten himself out sufficiently to go on the errand."

Cholera Yields to Modern Treatment

Dr. O. T. Logan, in his well equipped new hospital at Changteh, in the province of Hunan, China, has been having in late months a terrific struggle with cholera. Both the men's and the women's wards were so tremendously overcrowded that patients had to sleep in the halls and aisles. All in all, 600 patients were treated during the cholera epidemic, while the total of all cases for the year ran up to 17,077. In the staff of the hospital Dr. Logan is assisted by two fully qualified Chinese physicians of modern education.

The method of fighting the cholera cases was almost wholly with injections of salt solution, driven hypodermically into the veins. The success of the method was most notable. Many patients whom the old style Chinese doctors had pronounced hopeless were saved in the hospital by this means. The people of the city were deeply impressed by the service done them in the midst of the epidemic, and in several instances Chinese merchants who called to express this appreciation left substantial subscriptions.

The spiritual effect is notable, for the populace is more ready than ever to hear the gospel preached, and Christians likewise are more liberal in contributions to the erection of chapels at outstations and other methods of advancing the work.

Siamese to Adopt Surnames

According to the government gazette of Siam a royal decree came into force on July 1, whereby Siamese are to be compelled to take family names. It provides that a wife is to take the surname of her husband, and that if a son has not the father's surname, he must take that of his mother. Persons are forbidden to change their last names, after they are once chosen, without official permission, and the order further commands that the oldest living member of every household, or the head, must register the chosen family name within six months. Families who are already using such names must register them, and after a name is once settled upon, it must be used by all the members of a family. Any name may be picked out except those belonging to royalty or nobility. Low or obscene names are not allowed, nor names of more than ten letters long.

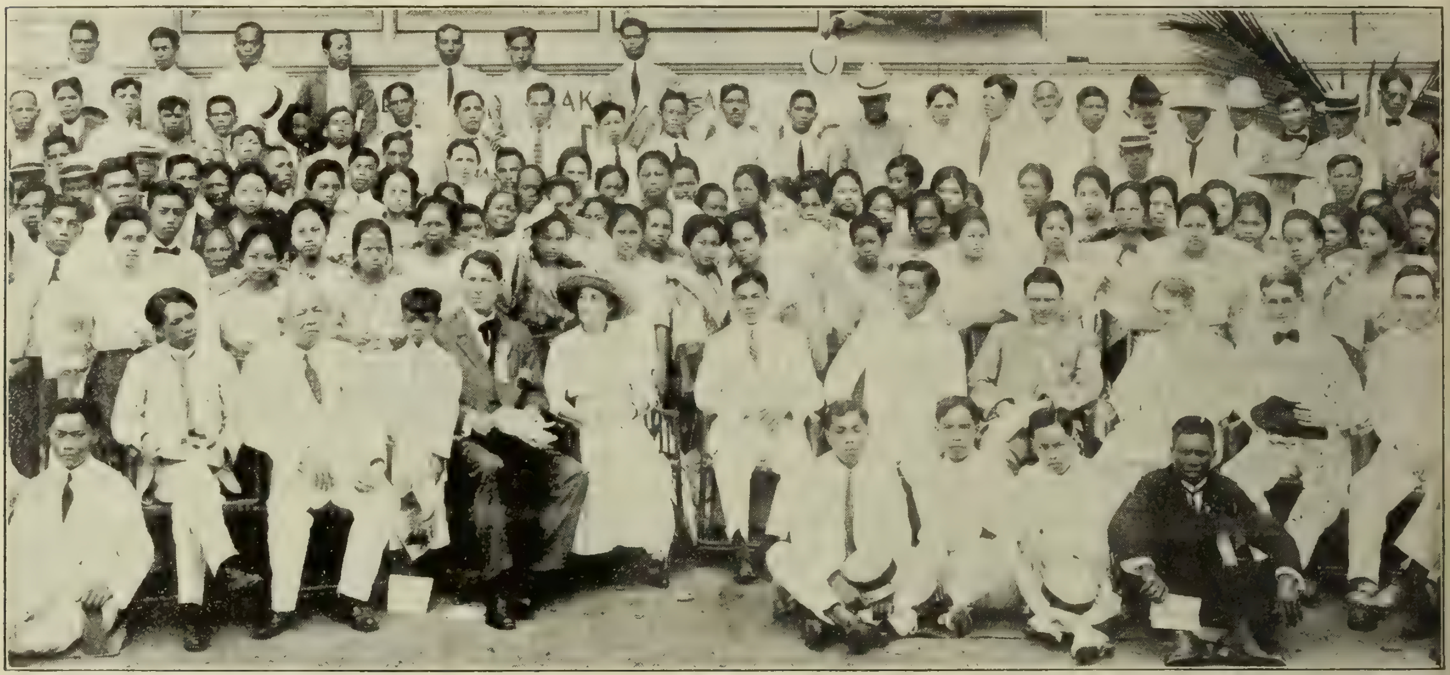
Missionary Brevities

—Dr. W. F. Seymour, who has charge of the medical work at Tengchou station in Shantung, China, recently found that seventeen of his native helpers had organized themselves into a sort of educational and evangelistic association for the purpose of holding meetings to discuss new methods of work and the general advancement of the things in which they are interested. They are planning for a reading and meeting place—practically a clubroom—where they can accumulate books and papers and hold their meetings.

—Miss Winifred I. Coxan, one of the teachers in the girls' school at Hangchow, China, was recently giving the smallest girls in the school a lesson on the Lord's prayer. She asked them the meaning of the word "ya-men," which is the Chinese transliteration of the English word "amen." "It's finished," promptly replied one small damsel. And the teacher then understood why the little ones always say "ya-men" with such fervor at the end of the long prayers of some of the Chinese brethren.

Board Notes and Announcements

McCord of the Westminster Guild committee told of discussions of methods and plans in the Westminster Guild conference held in connection with the Interdenominational Summer School of Missions at Winona Lake. A delegate from one of the Chicago chapters of the guild, Miss Harris, said, " didn't know what Winona was; had not realized the greatness of Westminster Guild; was ever day regretting that the whole chapter couldn' be there." Among the letters read was th first one received from Miss Hilda Laible o Efulen, Africa. Mrs. Fred P. Hartsook, president of Des Moines society, spoke.



Filipino Sunday School Convention

A pretty bright looking lot of young "semi-Americans," aren't they? There were 277 registered delegates, from a dozen provinces, at this Manila convention. The above picture shows a large part of the native delegation, together with half a dozen missionaries who were present. Usually their churches paid the railway fare. Other conventions were held in sections remote from the capital. The photograph is furnished by Rev. Alfred M. Williams, Sunday school educational superintendent for Idaho, Oregon and Washington.

The Open Hearth

Too Easy to Join Church?

Years ago when a revival was in progress men rose for prayers, went to a mourners' bench night after night and prayed for forgiveness. When peace came they were different people from what they had been. They quit drinking, Sabbath breaking, gambling, horse racing and became defenders of the faith, heroes of righteousness, workers. When they joined the church they came before the session and were asked to give their "experience," supposing, of course, that all seeking church membership must have had a religious experience. Each member of the session asked the applicant questions to satisfy himself that the person was truly a man "born of the Spirit."

How is it today? A man signs a card or raises his hand, saying he wants to be a Christian, and he is hustled before the session and voted into membership without a question as to his experience, belief or intentions. He passes through no experience of remorse for sin, repentance or of new birth. He merely says he wants to be a church member. He has not prayed, and will not if you ask him, should you ever get him in the church. He never is seen at prayer meeting, nor is he ever found in any church work. He may attend church if it does not conflict with business. He spends the Sabbath as before.

Who wonders at the wishy-washy religion of today? It is man made, on a par with and no better than that of the lodge. The men who come into our churches today with penitence, repentance and assurance of forgiveness, I fear, are very few. Who is to blame for this condition? Elders are put on the session who regard not the Sabbath, who will not offer public prayer, who will not attend prayer meeting. Why? Because they are wealthy or related to someone who is. Pastors are handicapped by such sessions and cannot do as they would. To receive members without credentials of experience weakens the church and wrongs the applicant, for he imagines he has something that he has not and probably never will have, now that his name is on the church roll. A man can join a church easier than a lodge, for they appoint a committee to look up his record. We don't. D. J. WOOD.

It Can Be Done

In his report to the last General Assembly Dr. W. H. Foulkes, general secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, stated that of 9,566 Sabbath schools only 213 contributed last year to that board and the total received was $1,998.09, an average of less than $10 for the contributing schools. For the whole number of Sabbath schools the average would be less than 21 cents.

How is it that 9,353 schools are reported as making no offering to this important work? It cannot be that all these Sabbath schools were unable to give.

If the Presbyterian Sabbath schools of the land would take up the task in dead earnest they could raise a half million dollars for the $10,000,000 endowment fund. This would be an average of a little more than $10 annually for five years. This not only could be done but should be done. Every Sabbath school should give something, and many schools could easily give $50 a year for five years.

Will not Sabbath school superintendents and teachers take up this task of helping to raise a half million dollars for the $10,000,000 endowment fund of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation? ROBERT CLUETT.

The Missionary in the Pulpit

As a pastor, it has always been my policy to stimulate the interest of my people in missions by opening my pulpit to accredited missionaries who have a story to tell and who can tell it well. Information creates interest and interest opens the springs of benevolence and prayer. Exhortation has little result unless preceded by instruction.

Rev. Charles A. Killie of Paotingfu, China, rendered us such good service on a recent Sabbath that I would like to recommend him to other churches wishing to increase their interest in missions. In the morning Mr. Killie gave the people a thrilling account of his experiences during twenty-four years of missionary service under our board in China. In the evening he gave his stereopticon lecture on China at a union meeting in the opera

At Supper
One Evening

The folks at the table found bowls of Puffed Grains ready to float in milk.

Gigantic grains, puffed to eight times normal size. Four times as porous as bread.

Crisp, airy wafers, toasted and thin. Bubbles of grain, ready to melt at a touch of the teeth into almond-flavored granules.

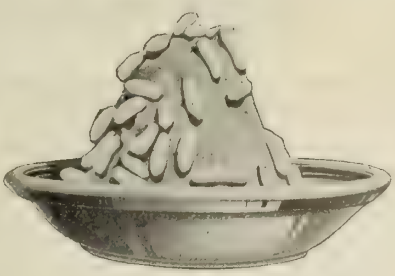
Here, for the first time, the folks at that table tasted whole grains made wholly digestible. And they found them enticing foods.

Perhaps a million homes have, again and again, served Puffed Grains in this way.

Countless people, this very day, had luncheons and suppers like this. Grains that taste like toasted nuts—brown, thin-walled, delightful.

There was never a supper more inviting, more nourishing, more easy to digest.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West



Here are other ways of serving. Terrific heat has given these grains a very nut-like taste. So people use them, in place of nutmeats, in a variety of ways.

They mix them with berries. They use them in candy making, in frosting cake and as garnish for ice cream.

In the morning they serve them with sugar and cream, like any breakfast cereal.

These are Prof. Anderson's scientific foods. They are puffed by steam explosions. Each separate food granule is blasted to pieces, so digestion can instantly act.

No other method ever invented fits grain for digestion like this. So these curious foods, which folks eat for the joy of them, are at the same time the best-cooked cereals that were ever made.

In these summer days enjoy them.

E. F. Evans Is Suddenly Killed

Tragic End of President of the Union of the Brotherhood in Cincinnati Presbytery—An Active Church Worker.

CINCINNATI—Death came suddenly to Edward Frank Evans, president of the union of the Presbyterian brotherhood in Cincinnati and a member of Norwood chapter—the first of the organization in this country. Mr. Evans, who was president of the Cincinnati Cordage and Paper Company, was spending his vacation at Lakeside, Ohio. While fishing on Sandusky bay July 21 he stopped on the railroad track to examine his tackle and a passing train, the approach of which was unnoticed, struck him. His body was hurled into the bay and was recovered by a life saving crew four hours later.

President Evans had for years been an earnest, active Christian worker. He was an elder in Norwood church and virtually the father of Oakley mission, which Cincinnati Presbytery officially recognized on the day of his death. The funeral service was conducted by Rev. George W. Shields and brief addresses were made by Rev. W. Henry Williams of Welsh church and Dr. Edward Mack of Lane Seminary. Mr. Evans was 51 years old and leaves a widow and six children.

The executive committee of the brotherhood has indorsed a plan for a memorial service in September as the fall inaugural of taking up the work from which he was so tragically called. There is unanimous approval of the idea to name the new church at Oakley the Evans Memorial.

Hold Bible School for Pastors

State University of Oregon Adds to Its Summer Courses—Rose City Park Church Is to Have New Building.

PORTLAND—John Boyd, D. D., of First church is at the state university, Eugene, at the invitation of the president, leading a Bible school. More than 200 ministers of all denominations were expected as the guests of the university to attend the special Bible study and discussions of topics that go to make the ministry efficient.

Rev. Thomas H. Walker of Calvary church has received a call to Boyles Heights church, Los Angeles. Presbytery will meet Aug. 1 to consider Mr. Walker's resignation. It is understood that the congregation of Calvary church will agree to the dissolution of the relation.

Rev. Otto Hanson has come to Fourth church directly from postgraduate work at Auburn Seminary. He enters into a situation requiring all the hard work a man can do and with the hope of rich response to it.

Rose City Park church is ready to begin its new building. The prosperity of the work of that church has compelled the step and it is taken with much enthusiasm.

Washington and Jefferson College at its recent commencement conferred the degree of D. D. upon Rev. Charles W. Hays of this city. He graduated from Washington and Jefferson twenty-five years ago. W. S. Holt.

Bible Society Works in Summer

The Massachusetts Bible Society is doing a more varied work this summer than ever before. In the western part of the state a religious census is being taken and in a number of centers a gospel tent evangelistic campaign is producing large results. French and Italian workers are placing Bibles in the hands of foreigners at Fall River. An effort will be made to raise funds to purchase 14,000 Bibles to assist the Gideons in placing Bibles in hotels in the state. A mass meeting to this end will be held at Old Orchard Aug. 11-13.

Attendance at Schools Grows

Cleveland Presbyterians Lead Other Denominations with Seven Centers for Bible Instruction—Get Everyone to Church.

CLEVELAND—Four Protestant denominations have inaugurated vacation Bible schools, the Presbyterians leading with seven, or two more than last year, when local work of this type was begun. The Baptists come next, with four schools, the Methodists have three and Episcopalians one. In addition to Woodland Avenue, Mayflower, Immanuel, North and Bethany churches, where summer work was done last year, two stations have been created at Old Stone and South churches, the latter ranking second in attendance. The mission superintendents of the four denominations are working in hearty cooperation, and prior to starting this year's work there was a union teacher training institute, which brought together in a profitable way the young men and women laboring in this summer effort. Besides the men in charge there are women assistants, such as kindergarten, sewing and manual training teachers and visitors. The Presbyterian enrollment has been steadily increasing to 1,322 at the close of the third week. Fifteen nationalities have been gathered. At the end of six weeks there will be graduation exercises in Woodland Avenue church.

Rev. E. R. Wright has resigned as religious editor of one of the daily papers in order to give all his time to the Federated Churches, of which he is secretary. The federation is planning an "Everybody-at-Church Day" for Sunday, Sept. 21, and that rally is to be preceded by house to house canvass. In connection with this special effort the Cuyahoga Sunday School Association will inaugurate a general forward movement.

Rev. William P. Thomas, who has hitherto confined his time to Mayflower church, will now give part service to the work at Phillips Avenue church, Dr. William Gaston also cooperating in the work of these two fields.

Church unity has been emphasized by the fact that the Windermere Presbyterian and M. E. churches have joined Sabbath morning services for July and August, the united congregations worshiping one month in one church and in the sister church the second month, each pastor taking a month's vacation and giving a month's service. Miles Park Presbyterian and Miles Avenue Christian churches are likewise holding union Sunday evening services. Arthur C. Ludlow.

Churches to Discuss Labor Problems

Labor Sunday is to be observed Aug. 31 at the suggestion of the American Federation of Labor and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Labor Sunday was inaugurated by the department of church and labor of the Home Board, now known as the bureau of social service, and for several years was observed exclusively by the Presbyterian churches. The topic for discussion suggested for this year is "Modern Tendencies in the Labor Movement."

The bureau of social service has got out a paper-covered reprint of the "Gospel of Labor," a booklet containing thirty-three typical articles syndicated to the labor press by the bureau. This may be purchased at 10 cents, the cost price. It is suggested that copies of this booklet be distributed to workingmen as a souvenir of Labor Sunday.

Bryan Will Speak at Winona

Among the speakers who it is expected will appear on the program at Winona Lake Aug. 24-30 during the week which is specially devoted to brotherhood problems will be W. J. Bryan, Dr. W. H. Foulkes, John Willis Baer, Dr. John M. Coulter and probably Dr. S. S. Palmer. It is expected that the program during this week will present brotherhood work in a very comprehensive manner.

The total registration for the first term of the summer quarter of the University of Chicago was 3,149, a gain of nearly 100 over a year ago.

How Much Did He Leave?

"How much did he leave?" asked one man of another. They were speaking about a wealthy, but selfish, neighbor, who had recently died. "All that he had!" was the significant answer.

The prosperous man cannot reasonably be expected to give away his capital while he lives. He needs it in his business, just as the carpenter needs his hammer and saw. Eventually, however, the man of means, like the carpenter, will have to leave all that he has. How will he leave it?

If he leaves a family dependent upon him, any man of means is under obligation to provide first for its members. If he leaves a church dependent, because of the loss of his support and service, he is under the same obligation to provide for it. How much will he leave his church family? The Christian man of means must answer this question for himself, sitting alone with his conscience and looking toward the Great White Throne.

There is no better and no safer place in which a Christian man or woman may leave a generous part of "the all" he or she has to leave, than in the Endowment Fund now being raised for the Relief and Sustentation of the aged and disabled servants of the Church, their widows and orphans, Until Christ Comes!

REMEMBER THEM IN YOUR WILL!

If you are thinking of leaving something for this cause, you may consult in strictest confidence.

Three Per Cent Gain in Members

Philadelphia Is Largest Presbyterian Center—Sunday Schools Show Decrease—Eight Congregations Have 12,550 Members.

PHILADELPHIA—There are 108 Presbyterian churches and three missions in the corporate limits of Philadelphia belonging to General Assembly. In addition there are over twenty United and Reformed Presbyterian churches, giving the city the lead in Presbyterianism, in respect to numbers, of the cities of the world. Of the 108 churches seventy-nine belong to Philadelphia Presbytery and twenty-nine to Philadelphia North, which has also connected with it thirty-six additional churches in adjacent territory. The communicant membership reported in these 108 churches is 54,330, a gain the past year of 1,752, or a little over 3 per cent. The whole number received upon confession was 3,102. Philadelphia Presbytery's Sunday school membership, 36,100, decreased during the year 174 and Philadelphia North's by 890. The churches reporting the largest number of accessions upon confession of faith were John Chambers Memorial 120, Tabor 103, Bethany 101, Northern Liberties ninety-seven, Bethany Temple eighty-four, West Hope eighty-three, Gaston eighty-one and Beacon seventy-eight. St. Paul's had the largest number of accessions by letter, 158. The churches reporting a net gain of 100 or over during the year are John Chambers Memorial 131, Bethany Temple 129, Beacon 103 and Northern Liberties 100. Nine churches report a net gain of fifty or over. A number of churches suffered a decrease in membership during the year. Only one of the 108 failed to have accessions upon confession. That one had two by letter. Eight churches having over 1,000 members are Bethany 3,514, Tabor 1,575, St. Paul 1,530, Germantown First 1,384, Bethlehem 1,350, West Hope 1,115, Gaston 1,080 and Walnut Street 1,026. Three others have over 900, four have over 800.

Gethsemane mission of Hollond Memorial church laid the corner stone of a new chapel July 21. The late pastor, Dr. Janvier; Dr. W. P. Fulton, the superintendent; George A. Steele and others made addresses. The chapel, which is paid for, cost, exclusive of the ground, $4,000. The Sunday school connected with it has over 100 scholars, mostly from families of laborers at the Point Breeze Oil Works. There is also a flourishing Christian Endeavor society. W. P. White.

The third yearly session of the summer school of Auburn Seminary closed July 19. Forty-two students were registered. Besides the regular faculty for the lectures, Rev. Warren H. Wilson, Ph. D., of New York conducted the department of the church and school in the country; Professor George Cross of Rochester Seminary lectured on "The Christian Doctrine of Salvation," Washington Gladden, D. D., of Columbus, Ohio, on "The Social Interpretation of Christianity"; William T. Elsing, D. D., of New York, "Geology as an Aid to Faith." A summer school for Christian workers opened July 21, continuing to Aug. 2.

Want Polygamy to Be Stopped

Pennsylvania Legislature Asks Congress to Start Action on Constitutional Amendment—Laird Institute Has Reunion.

PITTSBURG—The lawmakers of Pennsylvania passed a resolution, and it was signed by the governor July 21, asking Congress to authorize a convention to propose an amendment to the constitution of the United States prohibiting polygamy or polygamous cohabitation in the United States. The preamble declares that investigation has revealed the fact that polygamy is still practiced in the United States and that federal laws are needed to check it.

Old Home Day was celebrated by Laird Institute and Murraysville church at Murraysville, July 19-20. A large crowd of former students and residents of the town gathered from all sections of the country. Many who graduated from the institute have achieved success in their various professions, among the number being Judge John Haymaker and J. McF. Carpenter of Pittsburg, Professor Samuel Hamilton, superintendent of Allegheny county public schools; Joseph Duff, D. D., pastor of Carnegie church, and Rev. Joseph Clark of Dayton, N. J. On Sunday two of the former boys—S. E. Gill, superintendent of East Liberty Sunday school, Pittsburg, and Oliver Miller, superintendent of Central church Sunday school, North side, addressed the Sunday school. Dr. Joseph Duff preached in the morning and Rev. James Clark in the evening.

On their return from the world's Christian citizenship conference at Portland, Ore., Ng Poon Chew will occupy the pulpit of Shady Side U. P. church Aug. 3 and Dr. Charles Merle D'Aubigne of Paris the same pulpit Aug. 10.

Steubenville held a three days' celebration July 23-26 in honor of the men who participated in the revolutionary war, the civil war and the late war with Spain. Monuments were unveiled to three men of worldwide distinction who were associated with the revolutionary war—Baron Von Steuben, General Rodgers Clarke and Judge James Wilson, grandfather of President Wilson. A monument was erected on the spot, four miles from Steubenville, where Morgan's raiders engaged and defeated the militia of Steubenville. P. W. Snyder.

EDUCATIONAL

THE
SCHOOL
On Silver Lake, Rolling Prairie,
La Porte County, Indiana

Offers the usual academic course of the best schools, but builds into it an intimate knowledge of practical industries.

It teaches books and mechanics, history and electricity, art and agriculture—weaving all useful knowledge into one complete, upbuilding course that seems as natural to the boy as his daily life at home.

At INTERLAKEN (on Silver Lake) work and play are carefully blended to suit individual needs. The life is in camp and dormitory—two boys only to one tent or room—meals planned for health—vices condemned by common consent.

Highland Park College Deserves the Support of All Presbyterians

Both Students and Those Interested in Students

It is an accredited Presbyterian institution. Greatest technical school in America under church supervision. Courses designed for men and women with limited time and money. Eight school terms during the year. Students enter any time. Extremely low expenses. Student aid granted.

Ambitious Young Men and Women will find well grounded, thorough, practical courses. Liberal Arts, Normal, Engineering, Pharmacy, Oratory, Music, Domestic Science, Commerce and Home Study. Standard and special one-year courses. State and County certificates in Normal Department.

Presbyterians of Means who believe in vocational education and the training of young men and women for professions and skilled trades can find no better place for money gifts and endowments. The school is self-supporting. No deficits. Every dollar given will go into equipment.

A splendid opportunity to advance practical Presbyterian progress

A new $45,000 fireproof dormitory for women will be ready for occupancy September 1st. There is urgent need of gifts and endowments to provide a new men's dormitory and a new enlarged gymnasium. A small gift now will do more good than larger gifts in years to come. For photographs and further information, address

Italians Lead in Bible Schools

Seventeen Nationalities Represented in Summer Classes–Immigration Department Interested–University Heights Church.

NEW YORK—Nineteen daily vacation Bible schools are being conducted in the metropolitan district this summer under the supervision of the department of immigration. Nine of these schools are in Manhattan and the Bronx, five are in Brooklyn, one in Staten island and four in Newark. These schools are a part of the countrywide movement inaugurated by the department of immigration and are under the immediate supervision of Rev. Arthur H. Limouze, pastor of Northminster church. The largest school in the circle is the John Huss Bohemian church school, where daily 253 children gather to study the Bible and catch the helpful spirit of the teachers. Labor temple and the Italian Church of the Ascension are close seconds. These schools are all located in densely populated immigrant communities, and have already registered seventeen different nationalities, the leading one of which is Italian. Associated with Mr. Limouze are three supervisors and 111 teachers, paid and volunteer.

In addition to the vacation schools conducted by the board there are similar schools in Madison Avenue church, Faith, Old First and Williamsbridge under the management of the Federation of Churches, while yet another group, of which the largest is John Hall Memorial, including Westminster, Mizpah, Adams Memorial, Gregg (Brooklyn), and Spring Street, is conducted by the Daily Vacation Bible School Association.

Fort Washington Presbyterian and Washington Heights U. P. have united with churches of three other denominations to conduct services in a tent erected by the evangelistic committee of New York City at 179th street and Fort Washington avenue. Dr. Arthur J. Smith spoke at the opening service in the tent last Monday evening.

The corner stone of University Heights church, at Aqueduct avenue and 181st street, facing the campus of New York University, was laid last Saturday. The cost of the new edifice is to be $65,000, of which the church extension committee contributes three-fourths. Dr. Henry M. McCracken, for many years chancellor of the university, who is known as the father of this church because he was active in its organization in 1900 and served as preacher for the first three years, prior to the coming of the present pastor, Rev. Percy B. Wightman, participated in the exercises. From an original membership of fifty the society has grown to require a building fitted to accommodate a large congregation. The auditorium in the new structure will seat 550, with galleries for half as many more. The church plans provide for various institutional activities.

Open air meetings are held on Riverside drive, near North church, on Sunday evenings preceding the regular church service.

Worship in Church on Wheels

San Francisco Edifice Changes Location but Services Are Not Interrupted–Elder as Chief of Police Clashes with Pastor.

SAN FRANCISCO—For a portion of July Grace church has been worshiping on stilts. Its new pastor, Rev. Paul R. Dickie, coming in June advanced money to buy a new site and take the old church from an inside to a corner lot in the new Crocker addition, holding services in it while en route and before it had been settled on its new first-story foundation.

A unique situation from a Presbyterian viewpoint has occurred in Oakland. Chief of Police W. J. Petersen, elder in Brooklyn church, and Rev. Franklin Rhoda, pastor of Fruitvale church, have been engaged in a conflict over the proper solution of the red light problem. The chief is a militant elder and often takes to the pulpit on civic affairs. He advocates segregation, while Pastor Rhoda criticises him and leads a marching crusade against the disreputable resorts. The elder's pastor, Rev. H. K. Sanbourne, disagrees with the chief, but, like a large majority of church people, respects the honesty of his personal character and opinion.

Foreign Mission Gifts Show Gain

Per Capita Contributions in Chicago Increase — Fourth Church Gives Half of the Total Amount—Austin Scouts Study Bible.

CHICAGO—Thanks perhaps to the China propaganda campaign in this city last winter the per capita contributions of Chicago churches to the Foreign Board for the year recently ended were nearly 15 per cent larger than during the year preceding. The per capita foreign mission contribution was $2.92 last year and $2.56 for the year before. The total amount in 1913 was $91,682 out of a total of $457,628 to all boards from this presbytery. Fourth church, with a per capita record of $41.20, heads the list for foreign mission gifts. Offerings for home missions show an average gift for each member of this church for the year of $64.80. The total foreign mission contributions of Moderator Stone's church were $45,881. The next nearest church in per capita gifts is Lake Forest, with $8.16 and a total of $5,180, which is also the second largest contribution to the board from this presbytery this year. Next in order in per capita to foreign mission offerings are Highland Park $5, Hyde Park $4.13, Evanston Second $4.09 and Oak Park First $4. Many other churches devote themselves largely to other missionary enterprises, like Evanston First, which gives nearly $23,000 ($24 per capita) to home missions and supports Christopher House on the North side. The smallest per capita gift to the Foreign Board was 9 cents for the year.

Among visiting preachers in Chicago the coming month will be Rev. Frank E. Higgins, the sky pilot of the northern woods; Dr. E. A. Bess, the new student pastor at the Iowa State University; Dr. J. A. Marquis, president of Coe College; Dr. Frederick N. McMillin of First church of Walnut Hills, Cincinnati; Dr. Joseph D. Burrell of Brooklyn and Dr. G. Campbell Morgan of London.

Officers of the local Chicago Christian Endeavor union will make plans at once for the convention of the society in 1915 which will be held in this city. The Association of Commerce has promised $5,000 toward expenses and the union has promised an equal amount. A finance committee probably will be among the first appointed. The official party from Chicago returned from the coast last Friday.

In addition to their usual work the Boy Scouts of Austin church may receive credit for memorizing of certain passages of Scripture. The scout is allowed for Bible work certain points toward the 1,000 credits, which he must obtain to reach the next rank. This union of religious instruction with the regular scout activities is being watched with interest by many of those engaged in boys' work.

After a month's vacation the Chicago ministers meet in assembly hall Aug. 4 for business of presbytery.

Rev. Matthew F. Howie, a member of Chicago Presbytery, died last Friday evening. Mr. Howie had been in feeble health for some time. Doctors Beatty and Milner conducted a funeral service Sunday evening. The body was taken for burial to Argyle, Ill.

School and College

What is said to be the first school in America for the instruction of church organists will be opened this fall by Trinity school of church music, New York. Organists and choirmasters of Trinity parish will form the main staff of instructors. The school will give a course of thirty weeks for three years.

There were 273 graduates of Highland Park College, Des Moines, Iowa, at the exercises which terminated July 31. One of the principal events of the week was the inauguration of Dr. George P. Magill as president of the college July 28, Doctors W. H. W. Boyle of Lake Forest, Ill.; J. W. Countermine, C. H. Purmort and C. F. McKean of Des Moines taking part. The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by Dr. Boyle. The series of commencement events included class day programs by the graduates of the liberal arts, normal, oratory, engineering and music colleges, together with anniversary programs by the literary societies. The commencement address July 31 will be made by Dr. H. C. Swearingen of St. Paul, Minn. The program of the various exercises during the week made a booklet of twenty pages.

From Various Fields

Ohio

The summer Bible conference and training school to be held the first ten days of August in connection with Muskingum College, New Concord, is attracting considerable attention. Among the speakers at this interdenominational conference will be W. R. Moody, Dan Crawford, Dr. Isaac Headland, Dr. John Balcom Shaw, Dr. George N. Luccock, Dr. Warren H. Wilson and others.

Charles E. Rykert of Vallejo, Cal., has been engaged as assistant for Central church, Columbus. Mr. Rykert was for some years associated with Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman as a gospel singer and also served two years as assistant in a Baptist church of Buffalo, N. Y. Central church has joined with two other churches of the downtown section and with the Y. M. C. A. in union evangelistic services on the state house steps each Sunday evening during July and August.

Iowa

The remodeled Mount Ida church of Davenport was dedicated July 13 with special exercises under the direction of Dr. W. H. Kearns of Minneapolis and Rev. LeRoy M. Coffman of Davenport. Rev. J. Gilmour Smith is pastor.

Independence church will be closed during August for extensive repairs. Last year new furnaces and a new roof were secured, and now the whole interior is to be renovated, a new choir rail built and the floor covered with a cork carpet. The pastor, Theodore Morning, D. D., is in the sixth year of his pastorate, during which time over 100 members have been received into the church. Both church and pastor will take vacation during the time of repairs, services being resumed about Sept. 1.

Michigan

William Clark Burns, D. D., pastor at Monroe, is spending two months in Europe.

The clearing of the debt on Ionia church was celebrated July 18 by a special program, at which Rev. W. K. Spencer, pastor, and a number of members of the church took part. A former building was burned five years ago in a fire which destroyed several structures in Ionia. Subscriptions amounting to $23,000 were made in the town and the building, worth $30,000, is entirely free from debt. It is the hope of the pastor that in the near future the church will be open seven days a week and that night classes and gymnasium advantages will be available for the young men of the city.

Oklahoma

Evangelist Grafton beginning Aug. 24 will conduct open air revival meetings in a vacant lot near Maywood church, Oklahoma City. The pastor, Rev. E. B. Surface, on a recent Sunday took his congregation to First church and preached to the combined audience, Dr. Baird of First church being absent.

California

For a new building to be erected by the church of Azusa, Charles F. Richardson pastor, $11,000 is assured, which is within about $500 of what the lowest bid calls for,

Adrian van Vliet

the Dutch tailor

founder of a theological school possessed the same ideals discussed by Dr. J. Beveridge Lee in this week's Continent on page 1057

Dr. Lee writes that "responsibility" must be the largest word in the ministerial student's life and shows its effect in swinging him into pastoral service. Van Vliet felt the need of using his time and ability to train German speaking pastors and

founded a school

Responsibility bulks large in the life of every thinking person with reference to his means as well as to his life. Dubuque German College and Seminary has been suggesting week by week in various ways that Christian training for the foreign speaking peoples of this country is vital. It means a stronger America; a more potent church.

We have no lack of students. Many foreign born young men are ready to spread their lives for others. They come from Russia, Turkey, from Bulgaria, as well as from German and Bohemian homes of the Middle West.

Practically all of the students earn their way through school in part and many of them support themselves while getting the education which will enable them to be spiritual leaders of their own people in this country.

We offer you the opportunity to consider the reponsibility which the investment of your means entails, however small your income. We will gladly send you full details of our work.

Address C. M. Steffens, D. D., President, Dubuque German College and Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa.

and the contract has been let. The building is to be of stone, with cement basement for social purposes, nine Sunday school classrooms, young people's classroom, with one other for missionary and pastor's aid meetings. The audience room, with the classrooms available to be thrown together for congregational purposes, will seat 340 persons. An innovation was made on a recent Sunday evening by this church in an open air service, which was held on the lawn at the home of a member.

Indiana

A well attended Christian Endeavor society was recently organized at Graham, where Vernon P. Martin of Lane Seminary is supplying the pulpit.

A tablet to the memory of Rev. George Knox, for a number of years leader of the home mission work of this state, will be unveiled Aug. 11 at Gary Neighborhood House. This will be part of the exercises in connection with Home Mission Week at Winona Lake. Arrangements have been made for accommodations and it is expected that a large number of pastors and others will be present.

Increase in Payment to Annuitants

The sustentation department of the combined agencies of Relief and Sustentation of the Presbyterian Church U. S. A. is now paying its beneficiaries 40 per cent of the full amount of the contemplated annuities or benefits, according to a statement issued by Dr. John R. Sutherland, associate secretary. This is an increase of 10 per cent over the amount paid during the previous fiscal year. Dr. Sutherland says the progress the sustentation fund is making is most encouraging and gratifying to those intrusted with its management.

Financial Situation

Reduction in Express Charges Soon Will Affect Many Lines of Business—Parcel Post Rates Also Lower—Cement Industry Large.

The reduction in express rates which it is expected that the interstate commerce commission will announce soon, together with the modification of the already advantageous conditions of the parcel post rates, will redound to the benefit of the farmer and hence have a vital effect on holders of farm mortgages. If the means of transportation can be made so effective that the producer can sell direct to the consumer it ought to be possible for the farmer to get more for his produce without imposing on the consumer. If the farmer can get better prices his land will increase in value and be better security for farm loans and insure still further the payment of interest when due.

It is announced that the interstate commerce commission has marked the country into 950 blocks of fifty miles square and rates are based on the transfer of packages from zone to zone, all cities in one zone being considered as common points. The rates as worked out, opposed by the companies but favored by the commission, will result in a reduction of 25 to 50 per cent on packages of five pounds and under, and from 10 to 30 per cent on heavier packages. The new rates will go into effect as soon as published.

Parcel Post Rules Modified

The reduction of parcel post rates in the first two zones and the increase of the weight limit to twenty pounds has been met with loud protests by the railways, which assert that the increase in weight will do an injustice to them owing to the basis upon which the rate for carrying mail is fixed.

Stocks and bonds are becoming a little stronger, and there are some indications that the bargain days are passing, although there has been no rapid upturn. There is an indication in New York of a return of buying interest by investors, the demands for portions of the note issue by the Northern Pacific recently indicating that people are more than willing to take advantage of liberal offerings.

Railway Earnings Show Increase

Railway earnings for May show a gain in net of 9.4 per cent, although there are several conditions to be reckoned in weighing this figure. It has been suggested that a considerable amount of traffic which was denied the roads during high water in the Central West came into the May accounts to show the big gain.

The cement industry in the United States has made tremendous gains during the last few years. Cement has replaced wood in a vast number of places in city and country and is used in pavements and building construction where it was never thought of fifteen years ago. During the first half of this year the production has increased 25 per cent over the same months of 1912, with a total of 39,000,000 barrels.

Brief Bits of Business News

—Building operations in the United States of late reflect the recent tendency to go a little slow. The totals for the country show for the first half of 1913 a decrease of 2.8 per cent over the operations of the year previous. The country outside New York City, however, —Following many years of large exports of beef to other countries the United States is preparing to become an importer of this commodity. The department of agriculture has sent a representative to South America to prepare for the shipment of beef from there here.

—The government has filed suit at Portland, Ore., to dissolve the telephone monopoly there. It is charged that the American Telegraph and Telephone Company and subsidiaries have absorbed all independent companies. Congress may be asked to say whether or not the telephone is a natural monopoly.

The Young Women and the Christian Training School

ing the church can provide for their unique service.

The church is being compelled to abandon a drifting policy. We are nearly done with an untimely waiting for a misconceived providence to do for us what Jesus Christ has commanded the church to do. "Efficiency" has become a commercial watchword—it is a reecho to the church of Jesus Christ's insistence that the church shall be the light of the world. The specializing of occupations, the elaborate technical training now demanded in the arts, crafts, trades and professions are convincing proofs that only as the Christian worker shows skill in meeting conditions can he hope to succeed. Men who manage farm and factory with unqualified success will only sneer at a church that conducts its business at a poor dying rate. For all this the only solution of the problem is in careful, correct, consecrated training of lay workers in the church.

The pastor must face modern spiritual and social conditions and study approved methods of meeting current needs. He learns much in school, and more later, as to how best to labor for the evangelization of the world. But the pastor alone can do little. His sermons will scarcely arouse a dim interest if his congregation does not properly evaluate the remedial measures proposed. To frame appropriate local policies and to carry them out will be utterly impossible. He must find among his people at least a few who can sense the situation and lend a hand in planning intelligently, who can lead effectively groups of workers and in a word be the field officers of the great campaign. Consequently the young women of every local church should furnish one or more of their number who shall enter the training school and prepare for lifelong service in the church.

This is more than a call from an occasional enthusiastic theorist. Today, as never before, pastors and churches are searching for women who for a time at least will put all of their consecrated powers into service and work exclusively for the building of the kingdom.

Too often experiments with unqualified women occasion only waste of money and opportunity. First-hand contact with highly organized church machinery, heart to heart touch with throbbing humanity, safe and interpretative instruction from training teachers—these are sorely needed to qualify young women for the many positions open to them.

The training school will give these specific benefits to young women entering specialized Christian service—a knowledge of the English Bible and its best use in leading souls to God; a deeper, more vital, more efficient spiritual life; a clearer understanding of the place and work of the church in the world; a better understanding of current problems both at home and abroad; a practical understanding of modern church methods; a view of the world field sorely needed to enable one rightly to choose one's life work; practical experience in church work under qualified instructors. This equipment will so fit women for Christian service that could we place one in each local congregation in one generation the whole work of the church would be transformed.

The Ideals of Ward-Belmont

The ideals of an educational institution determine the sort of students that find life congenial there and the graduates it turns out. Ward-Belmont desires girls who shall come to make the most of what it offers. This school combines the high standards of two old educational institutions. It believes that shallow training weakens character and that no school should pretend to be more than it is. Refinement and elegance in life and conduct are held as prime requisites for a winsome woman, but at the same time the school believes that the graces of polite society are possible only when they are based upon definite moral conceptions and honest intellectual culture.

That leading colleges and universities admit Ward-Belmont pupils without examination is proof that classroom work is done thoroughly. The location of the school at the edge of a southern city gives the girls opportunities to attend concerts and lectures of a high order. The twenty-acre estate, made beautiful for a charming mansion, gives seclusion, and the modern buildings provide ample accommodation for the large school. All outside rooms.

Wholesome home influences and careful concern for corrective gymnastics make certain that each student shall receive the attention she deserves and needs. There is an instructor for each ten resident students, insuring personal attention.

Modern sanitation is included in the instruction in home making, as well as practice in actual marketing, nursing, dressmaking and management of servants. Schools of music, art and expression are conducted by faculties of the highest grade, insuring the best instruction and opportunity for development of latent talent in vocal and instrumental music, drawing, illustrating, modeling, painting and other branches of art. We hope you will permit our registrar to send you catalogue and finely illustrated booklet. IRA LANDRITH, D. D., LL. D., President. J. D. BLANTON, LL. D., Vice-President.

Readers will confer a favor on the publishers of The Continent by mentioning this paper when answering advertisements.

the resolution introduced into Congress by Representative Hobson, "house joint resolution 163," proposing an amendment to the constitution providing for national prohibition. The passage of this bill and its ratification by thirty-six states would abolish legalized liquor traffic in the United States. The Christian Endeavorers of the country have recently announced their allegiance to the effort to make America saloonless and the Good Citizenship Movement, of which Harry S. Warner, 301 Security building, Chicago, is the chairman, has outlined a comprehensive method of lining up all forces in a community looking toward the passage of this resolution and the subsequent campaign in each state.

Posters and other advertising mediums, motion-picture lectures, temperance news in local papers and enforcement of existing temperance laws are suggested as among the means of arousing public sentiment.

Skin Energy

The skin is an important contributor to the sum of human energy. So long as it is kept fresh, pure and healthy, it is an inspiriting and an invigorating influence; and the best known means of keeping it in that condition is to use

Pears' Soap

This completely pure soap, which has been the leading toilet soap for a hundred and twenty years, contains in perfect combination the precise emollient and detergent properties necessary to secure the natural actions of the various functions of the skin.

There is a permanent feeling of freshness, briskness and vitality about a skin that is regularly washed with Pears. The skin surface is always kept soft and fine and natural.

The skin is kept fresh and young looking by using Pears, which lasts twice as long, so is twice as cheap as common toilet soaps.

Around the Shop

It is related of a fervent and rather excitable New Yorker, well known some decades ago, that he rushed out of his club one evening and hailed a passing cab.

"Drive like everything!" he commanded, as he clambered in and slammed the door. The driver hesitated and made a move that indicated a desire for conversation. "Shut up!" yelled his "fare" through the glass. "Aren't you ever going to start?"

The driver, subdued, whipped up his horse and soon the cab was traveling at a rate considered in those days close to the speed limit. After fifteen or twenty minutes the "fare" rapped for the driver's attention. "What's the matter? Are you lost? Aren't we nearly there?" came in irritated staccato.

"I don't know, sir," responded cabby, politely. "Ye ain't told me yet where ye were a-wantin' to go."

Sometimes the Around-the-Shop Man's pen starts out in about the same way, when one of these little dissertations is begun. That's the advantage of not being an editor; when the editor writes he must have an objective to which he shall lead by the proper avenues of logic. The Around-the-Shop Man just "grabs up" the first vehicle of thought that comes along and sets it to going, and if the thought fails to arrive anywhere it's the thought's fault and not his.

There are no new stories. Some are older than others.

"De good book tells us," said the negro preacher, "dat in de las' days de sheep is to be put ter one side an' de goats ter de udder. Dey ain't goin' to be no 'stinction 'tween white an' black on dat day," he continued with growing enthusiasm. "But we all knows who has de wool."

The Around-the-Shop Man, being kindly disposed, attempts no journalistic application.

The First of All Virtues

WHAT IS THE PRIMARY HUMAN VIRTUE?

That is a perilous question to try to answer, of course. Every virtue is important; indeed, by the highest idealism every one is imperative. To rate one before the rest will offend by seeming to disparage the others.

Nevertheless, there is a practical bearing worth the risk in maintaining that the virtue which goes ahead of other virtues in laying the foundation of sound character is reality.

Reality is the first virtue because it is necessary to validate any other goodness in a man.

You may say that love is "the greatest thing in the world." Yet how much would love amount to if in time of test it should prove adulterated with selfishness that balked at sacrifice?

Or you may agree with Professor Royce that loyalty is the finest flower of life. But if loyalty should follow its cause only while fair weather prevails and desert when opposition and contempt appear, what would remain to be said in its praise?

Or if submission to God is counted the noblest element, even that goes for naught if submission turns bitter when God begins to exact suffering and hardship.

Nothing counts for character which is not genuine, thoroughgoing, real enough to stand use, trial and scrutiny.

Reality is more, however, than simply an attribute of other qualities in a life. It is much more than a first-premium ribbon to be tied on this or that merit of a man.

Reality is a virtue on its own account. It is in itself a note of personality. There are not merely real and unreal qualities in people; far more distinctly there are real and unreal people.

A real virtue has a mighty hard time maintaining itself in an unreal man. Insincerity "will eat as doth a gangrene." If the cancer has begun anywhere in a man's thinking or his actions or his words, it is almost certain to spread till it involves all of him.

The only sure defense from forfeiting all genuineness is to watch with fear and trembling against the intrusion of the least spot of ungenuineness into any phase of living. The only safe reality is the realness which is real all the way through.

The man of real reality pretends to nothing which he is not, affirms nothing that he does not believe, professes nothing that he does not feel, assumes nothing for sake of appearances, claims nothing as due his own merits, yields nothing demanded by his own conscience, undertakes nothing half-heartedly, does nothing triflingly, and withal in the whole of life day after day lives up to the watchword "Thorough!"—giving a hand of honest brotherhood meanwhile to all who live by the same rule.

That is a superb brotherhood—the affinity of men who are real. There is no other nobility half so noble. No order of knighthood in king's courts or rank of distinction in government or elevation of applause for genius equals it in honor.

And where people struggle for other distinctions which they are commonly thwarted from securing, this best of all nobilities is free to all and simple to be attained by any whose ambitions run toward it.

Yet it cannot be idly chosen. Eternal vigilance is not so absolutely the price of liberty as it is the price of reality. The possibilities of unreality are more numerous, more diverse and more treacherous than any other sort of temptation.

There is, of course, the gross crude form of hypocrisy wherein a man who knows himself wicked and means to be wicked pretends nevertheless to be good. That, though, is not the frequent form; it takes a man sunken far below the average level of human meanness to be capable of that.

But there are scores of types of insincerity which simulate the goodness of true religion so nearly that the well intending and respectable—yes, the righteous themselves—are the first and easiest to be beguiled thereby.

Of this sort are all the expedient conformities which dictate to a man that, for sake of his standing, he must keep up the show of those manners and sentiments which are expected of him on account of the associations in which he moves.

Two examples will point a sufficient application of this remark:

The pious talk supposed to belong to the atmosphere of religion, which men feel they must keep up lest somebody may suspect them of backsliding, is usually saturated with counterfeit sanctimony.

All this comes from living religion in the eyes of one's fellow men rather than in the eyes of God. The sole salvation from it is such an eager intensifying of one's own individual religious experience as makes it impossible for the lips to utter anything that has not been felt in one's own soul.

Only a constant and jealously maintained personal fellowship between a man and his God can create a spiritual life rich enough to reject the false coin of battered phrases which conventional Christianity scatters through the church.

Likewise, for a second instance, may be cited the insidious and seldom realized insincerity of the excuses with which pious men justify the selfish things to which pride and avarice prompt them.

The hardest conquest which grace has to fight for over human nature is the conquest of that citadel of sin—self-interest. And unreality there, as nowhere else, fights sin's battle for it.

A certain practice brings a man success in money or fame or power. And the man can't give it up; it is too precious a tribute to his pampered self-love. But he knows, of course, that he can't be a Christian while he holds to selfishness and its rewards. So he tries a lying alternative; he renames the selfishness and calls it "laudable ambition."

It is a poor and petty cheat. But it usually does the work; it cheats the man who invented it for the purpose of cheating himself. And however high he may climb after that in appearance of religion, he is nevermore a man of genuine likeness to Jesus Christ.

For Jesus was not only unselfish; he was really unselfish.

There must be armor enough in the armory of God to defend a man against all sin.

But if by any means we are unable to "take up the whole armor of God," let us at least seize the shield that is able to quench the fieriest of all the fiery darts of the evil one—the dart of unrealized hypocrisy.

The World

Mexico Rebuffs America's Pacificatory Plans

Armed intervention in Mexico may be forced upon the United States in spite of the most pacific intentions, somewhat as the Spanish-American war was forced upon us fifteen years ago by conditions in Cuba. To the indictment against himself President Huerta last week added insolence and studied insult. Ex-Governor John Lind, whose appointment as special commissioner to Mexico City was told in part of the edition of The Continent last week, was openly rebuffed by the Huerta administration. The Mexican secretary of the interior sent a message to the state department at Washington that Mr. Lind would not be received—would be "persona non grata"—unless his coming carried with it recognition of the Huerta government. This announcement was made in advance of the arrival of the special commissioner and before the Mexican government was officially apprised of his mission. Later President Huerta sent assurances of safety and courteous treatment for Mr. Lind, but the Mexican situation remained volcanic.

A street parade of students and other persons was held in Mexico City on Sunday as an ostensible expression of Mexican public opinion in behalf of the de facto government. But as has been pointed out by many observers of Mexican life, there is no public opinion in Mexico such as prevails in America for the reason that the common people are illiterate and almost utterly ignorant, have had no real voice in politics and are exploited by the few rich land owners, military leaders, bandit chiefs and their immediate followers.

The correspondents analyze Huerta's bold, shrewd game as a "bluff" by which be hopes to unite the various factions under his flag against the "foreign foe"—to wit, Uncle Sam. His adherents have spread the impression that the United States wants to invade Mexico, seize its latent wealth of mines and forest, cattle and agriculture, and oppress the peons.

Congress, the President and Mexico

An excited debate on the Mexican mess took place in the senate on Saturday. Senator Smith of Michigan asserted that a Washington lawyer, representing the constitutionalist or anti-Huerta forces, had the ear of the state department and had much to do with the removal (or resignation) of Ambassador Wilson. Senator Williams of Mississippi expressed the opinion that there was "organized and syndicated effort" to bring on war with Mexico, and that there was money behind the movement, "and not all of it Mexican money." Senators Kenyon and Crawford urged temperateness, and the last named senator voiced the highest confidence in the President and the state department.

Just prior to this debate the President had a satisfactory executive conference with the foreign relations committee, in which he outlined the chief features of his policy. He is reported to have told the committee that he withdrew Ambassador Wilson and sent Mr. Lind to Mexico in order to have there a man whose personality was in no way involved in Mexican controversies. He said Mr. Lind would offer no cut and dried solution of questions at stake, but would urge General Huerta to redeem his promise for a free and fair election. President Wilson's view is, in brief, that there is no government in Mexico having a constitutional title, and that the Huerta regime should not be recognized as anything more than the de facto government of a military chief ruling by the sword.

Peace Again Agreed Upon in Balkans

The peace conference in Bucharest last week agreed upon the essential terms of peace, which, it is believed, will be more lasting and satisfactory than was the case in the near past. Greece, Servia, Montenegro and Roumania all have cause for gratification, as each one has largely added to its territory. Desire for territorial expansion was fundamentally the cause of the war against Turkey, although misgovernment and oppression by the Turk furnished the immediate incentive. Bulgaria, too, will largely extend its boundaries, even though it was forced to surrender to its neighbors a considerable area which it had confidently hoped to hold. A strip at the northeast corner of the country from the Danube to the Black sea, south of Silistria, will go to Roumania.

While the Balkan states were engaged last month in the bloody conflict among themselves the Ottoman army under Enver Bey swept into Adrianople and repossessed the city and all the country round about, but it was positively stated in London that the so-called concert of Europe would compel Turkey to evacuate the reoccupied territory and respect the treaty with the former belligerents. Another question to be settled by the great powers is the exact boundaries of the new state of Albania.

Until all the new boundary lines have been precisely fixed, which will probably take many months, even though the proceedings are amicable, it will not be possible to say just what the five nations have jointly and severally gained at the Ottoman empire's expense, but approximate estimates have been made. The largest share will go to Greece, which will add 27,000 square miles of territory and a million more inhabitants to its former possessions, besides several of the Ægean islands. Servia gains 19,200 square miles of territory and 1,100,000 inhabitants, while Bulgaria gets 19,800 square miles of territory and 800,000 inhabitants. Montenegro wins 4,200 square miles of land and 230,000 inhabitants and Roumania adds 4,200 square miles of territory and 260,000 inhabitants. Bulgaria will have the largest territorial area in the Balkans, being slightly larger than Roumania, but it will have 1,500,000 fewer inhabitants. Montenegro's gain is relatively the largest, that little kingdom having doubled its area and population.

Turkey's grand vizier, Prince Said Halim Pasha, and Taliaat Bey, minister of the interior, made warlike statements last week which may presage further trouble. To the correspondent of The Chicago News at Constantinople they asserted that the Turks would stay in Adrianople as long as they possessed the military strength to hold the city. "We shall fight if necessary," said the grand vizier. Similar declarations were made by other members of the Young Turk party.

Foreign Nations and San Francisco Fair

Forty-nine nations have been invited to participate in the Panama-Pacific exposition which opens in San Francisco in February, 1915, and up to a few days ago twenty-seven had officially accepted and eight had declined. The most noteworthy declination came from Great Britain, and numerous American newspapers jumped to the conclusion that this decision was due to British resentment over the action of Congress in regard to the Panama tolls question.

Sir Edward Grey, the minister of foreign affairs, explained to the house of commons that business, not political reasons, had governed, as the cost of making a creditable exhibition at a long distance is heavy, and due advantage to exhibitors incommensurate with the cost. The Westminster Gazette, in an apparently "inspired" editorial, says it is hoped and expected that any diplomatic differences with America will be settled long before 1915, and other London newspapers have been prompt to dissociate the fair from the toll dispute. The London Times last Friday said the refusal to participate was a "mistake," but one not past repair.

Parcel Post Grows; Express Business Is Periled

Growth of the parcel post has been rapid and steady, and a sudden and marked increase in popularity is expected immediately with the going into effect August 15 of enlarged plans and reduced rates. The first and second zones will be united and the rates reduced and the maximum weight of parcels to be carried will be raised from eleven to twenty pounds. Postmaster General Burleson believes the rates announced are more than sufficient to pay expenses and will greatly increase the revenues of the department. It is expected that the transport of farm and factory products will be stimulated in the near-by zones, where about a third of the parcels are now handled. The use of distinctive stamps has also been abolished in favor of ordinary postage stamps.

Mr. Burleson is optimistic as to the future of Uncle Sam's parcel carrying business. He is quoted as saying that "eventually—it may be fifteen or twenty years—the postal service will handle practically all of the small package transportation business in the United States." He says further, "I expect to see the maximum weight limit increased to 100 pounds, and experience may demonstrate the practicability of handling the parcel business at even lower rates than we now propose."

Before the parcel post became effective it was estimated that 200,000,000 pieces would be handled the first year, but this estimate has now been more than doubled. In Chicago, which leads the country in the amount of shipments, the number of parcels handled monthly has risen from 3,000,000 till it has reached 6,000,000.

Competition between the parcel post and the big express companies is growing keen and will become keener now that the interstate commerce commission has ordered a reduction of express rates averaging about 30 per cent and cutting off some $26,000,000 from the express companies' yearly incomes. Express officials assert that the cut in charges means ruin, and they will appeal to the courts for protection. Their case has not been helped, however, by the action of the California state railroad commission, which a few days ago ordered the Wells Fargo Company to make sweeping reductions in rates. The California commission asserts that the company has been making a yearly profit of 136 per cent on its investment. Though its property is valued at $613,000, its profits were estimated at nearly $850,000. The state commission expresses the opinion that the railroads should themselves carry on this profitable express business instead of farming it out.

Religious World

Progressive Theologian Upheld by Wesleyans

Rev. George Jackson, who was loudly accused of heresy when he left a Methodist pastorate in Glasgow and became a theological professor in a Methodist seminary at Toronto, has had to undergo similar attacks in his new position with the faculty of Didsbury College, a theological institution of the Wesleyan church in England.

The agitation in England followed the publication of Professor Jackson's volume of Fernley lectures, "The Preacher and the Modern Mind." This appeared just after Mr. Jackson had been appointed to Didsbury, whither he was called direct from Toronto. The ultra-conservatives among the Wesleyans, as soon as they read the book, demanded that the appointment should be revoked. In this denomination the ministers choose its theological teachers, but certain lay leaders undertook to have the last annual conference at Plymouth request the "pastoral session" to oust the Fernley lecturer from his Didsbury chair.

A sharp debate ensued. The accused professor not only spoke for himself but was warmly defended by influential friends, who held him to have done great service among younger men in disarming skepticism. Finally an amendment was offered, saying simply that the conference saw no reason in the premises for making any recommendation at all. This was adopted with only seven opposing votes in a gathering of over 400 delegates.

Later the "pastoral session" met and heard a committee report on the subject. The committee said it had examined Professor Jackson's book and found certain statements in it unguarded and unhappily expressed, but the total effect of the lectures was "to restate and maintain in the light of modern knowledge the authority of Holy Scripture and faith in Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord." It was therefore recommended that Dr. Jackson should be left undisturbed at his post, and this after debate was adopted, 336 to 27.

Primeval Story of Creation and Deluge

Dr. Arno Poebel, who works as a translator of cuneiform inscriptions in the University of Pennsylvania, announces the successful deciphering of a tablet dug up from the university's excavations at Nippur in Babylonia, which is found to contain a creation story older than any other known literature on the subject. The Babylonian account of creation which in many Bible commentaries is compared with the story from Genesis dates from the reign of Assurbanipal, seven centuries before Christ. But the Nippur tablet is reckoned to be certainly as old as Hammurabi, who reigned 2100 B. C., and is thought quite likely to date 400 years back of that era.

This tablet, which is a block of clay about seven inches square, is chiefly remarkable because it attributes the creation of humanity to a female god, named Nintu. She seems to have been regarded as a rival of seven coequal male gods. This heptarchy of divinities determined to destroy Nintu's creatures because they had not continued in "the sublime commandments and precepts she made perfect," and though Nintu is represented as wailing in distress over the fate of her children, she could not prevent this just judgment upon them. But the high priest Ziugidda obtained the favor of the heavenly powers through his daily prayers, and was permitted to escape the fate of the rest of humanity by sailing the deluge in a boat. After seven days the storm of destruction subsided, and Ziugidda was guided to an island in the Persian gulf, where he lived in paradise thereafter.

Another Noble Patron of Education Dead

Robert C. Ogden

A great Christian philanthropist, whose concern for the development of Christian education was as conspicuous as that of the late Louis H. Severance, was Robert Curtis Ogden, who died at his summer home in Kennebunkport, Maine, on August 6. Like Mr. Severance, Mr. Ogden was also a loyal and devoted Presbyterian elder, a member of the session of Central Presbyterian church in Manhattan, whose pastor is Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith. Mr. Ogden was 77 years old, having been born in Philadelphia in 1836.

Mr. Ogden's very successful business career began at the age of 14, when he went to work in Philadelphia as an errand boy. Advancing step by step, he became, while still a young man, partner in a prosperous clothing business in New York. Later he formed a copartnership with John Wanamaker, the famous Philadelphia merchant, and became manager of the Wanamaker store in New York. From this he retired in 1907 on account of weakened health, but the strength which he thus saved by renouncing business obligations he turned to devote more intently than ever to his interests in philanthropy, which were thus proved to be fundamentally his governing interests.

In all Mr. Ogden's concern for education, it was to the education of the colored people that he was most devoted. This made him a loyal friend of General Samuel Chapman Armstrong, of whose marvelous work in the Hampton Institute of Virginia he was the foremost supporter. Since General Armstrong's death he had been president of the board of trustees at Hampton. He was also one of the organizers and for years past the president of the Southern Education Board, and in that interest he was in the habit of taking annually to the South as his own guests a company of northern educators and business men in order that he might lay the more strongly on their hearts the educational needs of both white and black in that region. He was, of course, an enthusiastic supporter of Booker Washington's work at Tuskegee. At first southern sentiment resented Mr. Ogden's activities as intrusive, but gradually a better understanding prevailed, and long before his death Mr. Ogden had the satisfaction of knowing that he was regarded with the friendliest appreciation by all responsible leaders of southern public opinion.

Next to this controlling enthusiasm in Mr. Ogden's mind ranked his concern for more practical theological education, and this had its expression in his constant enlistment of labor and sympathy with Union Theological Seminary of New York. Here he succeeded the late D. Willis James as chairman of the directors, and in that office he died.

For none of these institutions that held his laborious friendship did Mr. Ogden in any wise relax his efforts until last spring, when for the first time he was unable to join the Southern Education Board excursion. His absence from that trip was a signal of gradual decline, which resulted in his death last week.

The Common Sense of the Sabbath

IS IT NOT time for us to get over the notion that Sabbath laws are Puritan blue laws, or that the purpose of men who stand for the observance of the Sabbath is to thrust it down the throats of unwilling believers? Is it not time for Christian believers to end their hesitation in making the demand for a wise and firm control of Sabbath excesses? Sunday baseball and moving pictures, and other forms of sport, are not so necessary to any life, nor so helpful, that it is impertinent to demand their cessation.

There is not much difference of opinion among thoughtful people about the need of rest. Ours is not the first time when men have hurried too much, and there are more people than most of us suppose who are beginning to slow down, to take things more easily. Here is the head of a large business, who began in it as an office boy, at $3 a week, and became a partner while most of the men originally in the firm were still living. He tells that he noticed that the men who actually did the most were not the ones who were always nervously at it, who never could get away, who never had time for anything else, and who had no outside interests.

He noticed instead that the men who died prematurely and suddenly were those who felt they were so very important that they could not be spared; so they drove themselves long hours and as many days as possible. Then they died, and the business—went right on. This young man decided that as a Christian he would be steady and persistent, but never a nervous worker. The Sabbath is sacred to him, and he sees the common sense of a real observance of it. It gives him a chance to let off his strain. He points out that in his business the men who spend the Sabbath loosely come back on Monday in no condition for work, while the men who spend it in a Christian way are ready for their tasks.

Now, of course, the chief reason for urging Sabbath observance is that there is a great divine law that runs under the whole race, which requires not chiefly that there shall be a time for rest, but that there shall be a time for worship. The value of the Sabbath from our Christian point of view is that it gives people a chance to worship Almighty God, which they cannot do if they work, and which they will not do if they play on Sunday. The objection to seven-day work is that if a man wants to worship he cannot do it. But after that there is the large value of the Sabbath as a time for the building up of men. Our merchant friend says that in theory he had always held that pleasure resorts ought to be open on Sunday for the sake of the people who could not go to them on week days, but the more he saw of the result the less he believed in it. These are pleasures that use a man up, instead of building him up.

One of the large business houses of Chicago has a rule in its manual that employees are to seek the right kind of associations and the right kind of pleasures outside of business hours. That is for the sake of the business. It is a safe rule that no man ought to do on Sunday what wears him out for the following week. The Sabbath was made for man, Jesus said, and God intended it to be used for the highest part of our manhood. Excesses on the Sabbath, in any form, are a violation not of God's law written in the Scripture alone but of God's law written in human nature. As Christian men we are eager to upbuild the church. So we insist upon the Sabbath. But equally, as Christian men, we are eager to develop and aid our race and civilization. So we insist again on the Sabbath. We are not narrow-minded in it; we are not petty and bigoted; we are simply sensible. We are insisting upon the thing which history and common sense declare the race needs.

Church Freedom Vindicated by Federal Courts

If it were only a question of the property involved The Continent would feel little impulse to rejoice greatly over the two federal court decisions in Tennessee which attest the legality of the union of the Presbyterian and Cumberland Presbyterian denominations. The publishing house property in Nashville which, by one of these decisions, is awarded to the Presbyterian Board of Publication, will undoubtedly be far more useful in the hands of that experienced organization than it has been in the amazingly incompetent hands of the Cumberland antiunionists who have been lately running it. But even that consideration would not, in the opinion of The Continent, justify the resort to litigation if there were nothing else at stake.

The vital importance of this legal victory for union lies in its emphatic notice to sectarians that they cannot, by threat of court injunctions, make modern Christians cower down in bondage to the present intolerable state of division among Protestant denominations. The verdict of the state supreme court of Tennessee a few years ago, which amounted to saying that any church union, no matter how good, might be completely upset by the opposition of a blind and stubborn minority, operated to paralyze every Christian union movement then afoot anywhere in the country. To work with high-minded devotion for years to weld two denominations into one, and then have the labor all nullified by the interference of a prejudiced secular court, incited by unscrupulous bigotry, is an experience that not many people have the grit to invite. The easier way out is not to try for union—to let matters drift as they are.

But now, fortunately, there has come a deliverance from this paralyzing incubus. The federal courts have intervened in Tennessee, and just as all good legal authorities predicted, the independent judges on the federal bench have reasserted the liberty of the church in matters of this sort from any civil supervision. The intolerable assumption of the state courts that they had the right to pass judgment on Christian creeds and polities is superseded by a direct assertion of the principle which it would be supposed no American could ever have questioned—that all churches have a right for themselves, through their own constituted organizations, to express their own faith, determine their own methods and establish their own relations with other Christian bodies. It is thus made sure that the United States judiciary will stand firmly as a bulwark of church freedom in this country. Thus protected within their own proper territory, all American denominations may work, secure from external hindrance, toward any solution of the problem of church union which their own wisdom may inspire and validate.

So a portentous cloud disappears. Antiunion sentiment is still free to express itself within the church and make as much impression as it may. But it cannot any longer add to its arguments the wicked intimidation of threatening to frustrate union by legal injunction against it. That is what the latest tidings from Tennessee mean, and that is the reason why The Continent does take very great cheer from the news. There will, we presume, be appeals to the higher courts by the defeated antiunionists, but that is only formal legal practice. A clear road lies ahead now, and even the appellants must foresee the certain defeat to which they are coming out.

To Unite Everybody Requires Broad Terms

Reports of the way in which a pledge to "vote right" was administered to the young delegates of the Los Angeles Christian Endeavor convention by Rev. Daniel A. Poling, the new citizenship superintendent of the United Society, suggest a fear that Mr. Poling and his associates have not quite compassed yet the whole meaning of their promise that his work should help "get together" all sorts of people who want to see the liquor traffic abolished. As The Continent understands, Mr. Poling invited young men—and the young women from equal suffrage states—to promise before God that they would not vote for any candidate for public office who had not declared against the saloon business. There are, of course, many zealous Christians who argue that this is a rule of self-evident obligation of every Christian citizen. And such persons have naturally associated themselves politically in the Prohibition party, where they always have candidates thus committed. But there is a greater host of equally sincere and equally perspicacious church people who believe that the ends of righteous government sometimes oblige them to vote by other issues than the single issue of temperance. They feel also that they get on more rapidly to the temperance goal by selecting from among candidates who have an immediate chance of election the nominee likely to be least friendly to the saloon. There are thus two emphatically different viewpoints touching Christian duty in this matter, and if Mr. Poling really wants to enlist the cooperation of everybody who detests the liquor traffic he should certainly avoid forms of words that can be acceptable only to those who adopt the partisan solution of the question.

Riding Another Valiant Tilt with Civic Wrong

The "executive committee of the Men and Religion Movement" in Atlanta—which signifies chiefly those two modern knights errant, John J. Eagan and Marion M. Jackson—having advertised the houses of vicious resort out of their city, are now employing the same weapon of public appeal to public opinion to crush prison abuses in Georgia. They are fighting to pass through the state legislature bills that provide for building a state reformatory for girls, for granting judges the right to parole first offenders and especially for humanizing Georgia's incredibly brutal institution of the chain gang. As in their vice crusade, Messrs. Jackson and Eagan are publishing in the daily papers of their city two-column display advertisements that are amazing masterpieces of the sledge-hammer use of English. The reader fairly quivers under impact of the short, stern sentences in which these two determined Presbyterian elders embody their plea. "Bulletin No. 62," which recited, with naked literalness and not the slightest glozing of rhetoric, simply the average day-and-night history of an ordinary chain gang, was a piece of realism that veritably made the flesh creep. Two 12-year-old boys, two 13 years old, three of 14 and eleven of 15—these daring truth tellers declare—are wearing chains day and night in Georgia under long penal sentences. Undoubtedly these men, with such heroic determination, will win their new crusade—a crusade for Christian mercy to temper the justice of their state, for the motive of reform to supplant the purpose of vengeance. No state with a citizenship such as Georgia has can endure unmoved an appeal so tremendous as this.

A Letter That Roused the Devil

The letter to a Baltimore daily newspaper for which Superintendent W. H. Anderson of the Maryland Anti-Saloon League was horsewhipped afterwards by a degenerate boozer has been made famous by the incident and is being widely reprinted. Mr. Anderson or anybody else could afford to take a whipping for the privilege of hitting the liquor business such a smashing blow as this:

"Before long, when a brewer buys an automobile, people will figure out how many little children were robbed of carfare to the parks before the price of the auto filtered to him in profits. When some distiller contributes to charity, or builds a church, or finances some similar enterprise, folks will begin to wonder how many men were robbed of the hope of heaven by the stuff which he sold for profit, knowing it to be injurious, to enable him to pose as a generous patron of the church. When the wife of some distiller or wholesale liquor dealer or prominent grocer who makes a specialty of liquor blossoms out in a diamond necklace at the theater, the margins of programs may be covered with calculations of how many children and mothers have gone without decent clothes in order that she may shine resplendent. And the day is not far distant when the socially prominent wife of a man who has made his money out of the liquor traffic, upon giving some lavish entertainment in a palatial home, will find that even the guests will involuntarily trace the connections between that luxury and the hovels in the slums, and the pitiful sight of household goods on the sidewalk where a drunkard's family has been evicted for non-payment of rent, and regard her as a social parasite."

—Pastors who have been calling so loudly for literature to counteract the propaganda of "Pastor" Russell need ask no more than Charles C. Cook of New York has now supplied them in his own little pamphlet "All About One Russell" and in the companion booklet which he publishes at the same time, "Some Facts and More Facts," the author of which is Rev. J. J. Ross of Hamilton, Ontario, against whom Russell vainly tried to make out a libel case. Mr. Ross reproduces the original circular on which the futile libel complaint was based and adds a lively account of Pastor Russell's grotesque confusion under cross-examination in the Canadian court where the preliminary hearing was had. Russell made such a ridiculous showing there that the case never got farther. Mr. Cook embodies in his sketch a large part of William T. Ellis's famous Continent articles on the "pastor." Neither of these tiny pamphlets, it is true, looks more than a pygmy compared with Russell's own portly tomes, but they are quite sufficient for the purpose. There is not so much to be said about Russell after all, and what is said here is quite enough to convince the unprejudiced that he is not at all the sort of man to whom a God with no delight in liars would commit a special revelation of divine truth.

—"They also serve who only stand and wait." Assuredly. God is served by whosoever in any part or manner shapes human nature closer to the divine image. And he renders peculiar service who has the grace and steadfastness in his own person to conform his own position of human nature to the enduring patience of God. To work as God works is much for a man to achieve, but to wait as God waits—to wait in hope and with faith—is vastly more. It is only the few who are strong enough to make demonstration of this well nigh ultimate virtue of likeness to God in his patience. But those few are veritable beacons set on a hill, and as their fidelity shines forth steadily to an impatient world they may well be rated among the most eminent of the serving men of God.

—The sermon that reaches the people is the sermon that sets out definitely for some point of application to the people—and keeps marching till it gets there. Most discussion over the proper length for a sermon misses the main consideration. The right rule for sermon lengths is equivalent to Lincoln's rule for the length of a man's legs. The legs, he said, ought to be long enough to reach the ground, and the sermon similarly ought to be long enough to reach its object. It ought to get home to deposit on the hearts of hearers a definite impression clearly conceived and purposed beforehand by the preacher. When the discourse arrives there it is time for the preacher to stop, but it is really a spiritual recreancy for him to stop before getting there. A sermon mechanically limited to fit a certain segment of the clock dial is almost inevitably doomed to exhibit the disadvantages, one way or the other, of the homiletics of Procrustes. A congregation which realizes that its preacher is going somewhere and means to get there will be patient with his running overtime. Moreover, the effect of this rule consistently applied will be oftener to shorten than to lengthen the sermon.

—Death never seems so cruel as when he robs the world of a successful worker in a field for which few workers have shown capacity. It is this which makes double sorrow for the loss of Roswell Bates of New York City. Pastors are so rare who can deal efficiently with what the church has come everywhere to designate as the "downtown problem." But Mr, Bates met that problem with wonderful (yet beautifully unassuming) success. Under his ministry Spring Street Presbyterian church, far down on the lower West side of Manhattan, kept on its way, a self-supporting congregation in a region where practically all other Protestant work has declined to the home mission status, and made an intimate Christian home for various nationalities of the new immigrant population, while still serving also the small native American remnant that had not removed from the neighborhood. The history of Mr. Bates's pastorate should be written for the encouragement of other downtown pastors. And the church at large should pray for a man as strong and as devoted to be sent to take his place.

—Leisure from one's self—from concern even for one's own duties as well as from anxiety for one's own fortunes—is a condition to which the soul must at times come if it achieves the right outlooks on the obligations of life. As mathematicians strive to eliminate the "personal equation" from their calculations, so must the learner of the moral facts of God's universe know how to be at times an impersonal observer of what is and what should be, if he measures aright the permanent relations of character. "What would be right with myself out of it" is what one must make sure of before he can come surely at what will be right with himself in it. Get the general principles of the case straight in your mind first and add yourself to the problem afterwards is the only rule which fairly promises a solution not biased by selfish considerations and personal prejudices.

—Good old Dr. Hiram Haydn of Cleveland lived so long after he ceased from the active ministry that it was his misfortune almost to be forgotten before his death. But the report of his decease revives in reverent memory the picture of a sturdy figure who always followed his ideals with resistless loyalty, and who was one of the most useful of those that labored in the last decades of the nineteenth century to make a plain highroad for the church into the broadening opportunities of the early twentieth.

—In The Methodist Times of London a trenchant writer declares that the church of today never wins any great victories because it never gets quite to that extremity which is God's opportunity. Whatever its difficulties, it is always able to think of one more expedient to try before it throws itself helplessly on God. "If fire does not fall from heaven on our sacrifice, somebody always has a match."

The Minister Who Wants to "Move On"

BY E. HUBERT BROYLES

IN THE church a spirit of restlessness is prevalent which should appeal to everyone interested in the work of the kingdom. This restlessness is a restlessness of the ministry rather than of the church. It is true we find much of uneasiness in the pew, but I am inclined to believe that the pew's uneasiness is largely a reflection of what it gets from the pulpit.

My acquaintance with ministers is, I should say, fully as extensive as is the acquaintance of the average pastor. Within this circle of acquaintance I am on terms sufficiently intimate with many ministers that they occasionally unburden their hearts to me. Reading between the lines gives an insight into the attitude of many others who have not consciously expressed themselves in a clear-cut statement. In the light of these explicit and implied confidences I feel safe in saying that the minister who is content in his parish is the exception, and that the greater number, while perhaps not aggressively seeking a change of location, would welcome overtures from another church. Many, many men are actively seeking a change. A certain church, not particularly desirable, had thirty-five applicants within two weeks after becoming vacant.

It is probable that the minister who does not have at least one appeal a month from some friend desiring a change is an exception. And this is no criticism of the man making the appeal; for under our system of government, it is the exceptional case when a man secures a call to a church except through the mediation of some or many friends. In any other line of work the man who has not snap enough to vigorously prosecute his application for a position is not considered sufficiently aggressive to handle the job if he should get it. But in the ministry he must demurely wait as a coy maiden until his modest charms have made a silent appeal to some pulpit committee. If, by any chance, he should have the temerity to take the initiative the fact that he has made the approach himself in an open, manly manner is at once registered against him. It is so much more discreet to have a friend present his charms; yet it is a fact of common knowledge to churches and ministers alike that such recommendations ordinarily originate in the study of the man who is recommended. However this may be, the truth remains that a distressingly large number of ministers are "on the move."

Have Four Ministers within Five Years

In a presbytery with which I am acquainted there are forty-eight churches; of these forty-eight only five have the same pastor they had four years ago. In some of these churches there have been no fewer than four ministers within the same length of time. In this same presbytery there are forty-six ministers; yet only seven of them have continuously had a pastorate within the bounds of this presbytery for the past four and one half years. It is not uncommon to hear Presbyterians say, "I do not like the way the Methodists change preachers so often." But it seems as though the Presbyterians are just as adept as lightning change artists.

Can it be that there is a vital connection between the restlessness in the pulpit and the lack of vitality in the pew; between the desire of ministers for a change and the lack of adequate growth in the churches? Restlessness never makes for stability in the churches; and until, in some way or other, some adjustment making for permanency in pastorates is worked out the church at large must continue to suffer loss as it is now doing.

But of course there can be devised no relief for the present acute condition until there is an understanding and a brave facing of the causes which have been operative in the making of the present deplorable condition.

The ministry is rather inclined to lay all the blame at the door of the church; on the other hand, the church is equally sure the ministry is shirking its own burden and endeavoring to force the church to bear it. Perhaps we should seek the truth along the line of both these charges, for the ministry and the church have heartily cooperated in building up the present status. I think I am violating no trust in saying that, out of the confidences revealed by many ministers in their confessions and in their experiences with many churches, both pulpit and pew are blameworthy.

How Minister May Vitiate His Own Work

Let us take up first the minister and see how liberally he has contributed to vitiate the force of his own work.

1. He too often finds himself a shallow well pumped dry. Almost any man can so apply himself that it is possible for him to grind out a sufficient number of reasonably creditable sermons to run him a year or two. But if our man is lazy and finds no joy in mining truth, he, like the financially improvident, finds it "easier to move than pay the rent" of studious application. So he seeks another church and sometimes does not even go through the formality of turning his barrel upside down. A minister casually remarked to me one day, "I buy only one or two books a year"; implying that now that he had reached middle life it was unnecessary for him to study. He was manufacturing for himself out of his own laziness his own dead line. Radically different was the conception of a lawyer friend who was fond of saying, "If you continually draw from the think tank you must keep it filled up."

2. Lack of diplomacy is a charge which may be laid at the door of many ministers. They think that hammer and tongs are the proper tools; especially when there is a difference of opinion between the minister and the session or congregation. One of the most practical of our seminary presidents advises the minister to be very familiar with the hypodermic syringe; then in cases where a difference of opinion is anticipated to dexterously administer a hypodermic injection of his own ideas and let them work quietly; from time to time repeat the doses until there is the desired effect. That is just another way of advising diplomacy. And no one is in greater need of diplomacy than the minister. In every congregation are found many conflicting ideas upon the adjustment of which impinges the moral and spiritual appeal which that church will make not only to its membership but to the community. The satisfactory adjustment of these conflicting ideas demands a diplomacy for which the federal government would be the better were this diplomacy available for political use.

3. Some ministers consider just any other church better than the ones they are in. This comes from a spirit of restlessness which has never been trained out nor consecrated. To such a man the ideal church is the one that will call him next—and so on ad infinitum. A consecrated ambition for a more extended usefulness is not to be stifled; but the changing from one church to another just like it is a marking of time which wastes energy.

4. Supersensitiveness to criticism may drive a minister from a field. The very nature of the work of the ministry renders the minister sensitive to whatever may be said or done against him. But he must have the courage of a man in facing criticism; if the criticism is unjust let him cast it aside and forget it. The minister who, in endeavoring to dodge criticism, plays "Pussy wants a corner" with pulpits is just hunting a fresh brand of criticism.

5. Some ministers are fatally afflicted with an aggravated case of personal faults. Sloven in dress, uncouth in habits, prone to gossip, lacking in common honesty in business—of course such a man will be restless in any church. It would not require any great diligence to add other items to the indictment, but perhaps this is sufficient.

How Churches Cause Ministerial Restlessness

As intimated, the whole difficulty is not with the ministry but a large part of it may be carried to the pews. Let us, then, as a second thought consider the church as contributory to ministerial restlessness.

1. Inadequate support is perhaps doing more in the present crisis to drive the minister from church to church than any other one thing. This is not because the ministry is mercenary. But the minister must pay his bills, and he must meet them promptly; otherwise his influence is nil. Yet how can he meet his bills if his income is inadequate to his needs in that community? In too many cases there is hollow mockery in the language of the call which says, "That you may be free from worldly cares and avocations, we hereby promise and oblige ourselves to pay you the sum of ——." In hundreds of cases it is fully realized by both the minister and the church that "the sum of" is wholly inadequate; yet the offer is brazenly made by the church, and weakly accepted by the minister with the realization that it is a cup of agony by day and horror by night. An adequate salary for any man, minister or ditch digger, is a sum sufficient for him to maintain himself and family in harmony with the standards of the community by which he is judged socially. Any church which is not so maintaining its minister has made a grave mistake either in the selection of a minister or in the amount of the salary. Any church which is unable in reality to so maintain its minister should either ask aid from the home mission funds, unite with some other church or close its doors. Just as long as pride, or stinginess, or sectarian narrowness, or the composite of all these, keeps so many churches open there will be found men whose ignorance of conditions or whose necessities will lead them to accept their calls. And in turn, just that long will the church be handicapped by the restlessness of its ministers. It is pathetic to hear the stories of struggles for decency on inadequate salaries that some ministers tell. An unpardonable sin on the part of some churches is the tacit promise of an increase in salary in a few months used as a bait to lure a pastor to its pulpit; then when the man comes the promise is forgotten. Financial delinquency will ruin a minister; but when the delinquency is on the other side the church can save its face because the delinquent ones are "leading business men"!

Sometimes Smothered in Antiquities

2. The antiquated methods of some churches drive away some ministers. The church today, and rightly, demands results of its minister. Yet how can he produce results amidst the conditions in which he must sometimes work? Some churches expect the minister to reap the world harvest of the twentieth century with the great-grandfathers' old reaping hook of the eighteenth century. New occasions teach new methods as well as new duties. A spirit of progress is dominant in every age, but too often the last place its influence is felt is in the methods of church work. An up-to-date business man is not appealed to by antiquated practices even though they be marked by the most pious labels. The duty of the church is not to conserve those things which have endeared themselves, but the rather to proffer that which will make the strongest appeal for the kingdom of God. No minister who appreciates the value of his ministry to a community can be other than restless if he is half smothered in antiquities.

3. In some way or other there arose a demand on the part of the church for perpetual speaking by the minister. He must preach

Dr. Gray's Protege Wins World Honor

BY HERBERT H. SMITH

Lawton Parker

I SUPPOSE if it had not been for Dr. William C. Gray of The Interior I would be plowing corn today in Nebraska," said the man who was awarded first prize in the 1913 exhibition of the Paris salon. This is an honor dreamed of by artists the world over, and for the first time it has been awarded to an American. In fact the second prize has been awarded to only nine Americans since Sargent first got it in 1881.

Lawton Parker is the man whose merits are thus recognized. This latest honor which has come to Mr. Parker is but one of a long list of prizes and medals which he has taken in various expositions and contests, but the first prize he ever won for his artistic work was that offered by the late Dr. William C. Gray, who as editor of The Interior conducted a competition for readers of that paper twenty or more years ago.

This competition by The Interior was open to anyone under 18 years of age and was similar to the prizes frequently offered by the Young America department of The Continent for stories and pictures. This contest of years ago was for the best drawing in which appeared a cow, a milkmaid, a fence and other barnyard scenes. Competitors were given permission to place the named objects in any relation they pleased. Mr. Parker, who was then 14 years old, had been making drawings for the amusement of his schoolmates for a number of years. His parents had encouraged him in his artistic leanings by presents of a box of water colors and similar evidences of their appreciation. The prize given by Dr. Gray was a book, and the fact that young Parker had been able to surpass all others in this contest spurred him to devote more time to his drawing. In a few years he came to Chicago and entered the Art Institute.

"I soon saw that the way to get ahead of the rest of them in the institute," said Mr. Parker, "was to put in more hours than the others." This idea of hard work has been kept uppermost in his mind in connection with all subsequent endeavors. He studied in Paris for two years and was successful in many of the exhibitions which he entered.

The friendship of Dr. Gray toward the young artist was very close and for a time Mr. Parker had his studio in Dr. Gray's residence. At other times he accompanied the editor of The Interior to Island Lake camp in the north woods, where Dr. Gray wrote his well remembered Campfire Musings. Mr. Parker often went with him on tramps through the forest and his first outdoor work as an artist was a sketch of Dr. Gray in the act of cautioning silence to his hunting companions in order not to frighten a bear seen in the distance. About half of the painting which Mr. Parker has done during his career has had to do with the outdoors. A large number of the illustrations in The Interior about the year 1900 were by Mr. Parker.

In addition to the first prize of the Paris salon awarded by vote of the jury of the sixty best artists of France, Mr. Parker received a silver medal at the St. Louis exposition, a gold medal at the International Exposition in Munich in 1905, first prize from the Chicago Society of Artists, 1908, and the Martin Cohn prize of the Art Institute, Chicago, 1908. Many of his paintings are portraits, and among the well known people he has painted are Cyrus H. McCormick, David R. Forgan, President Harry Pratt Judson, Mrs. Norman W. Harris, Martin A. Ryerson, J. Ogden Armour and ex-Judge Grosscup. The painting which has been judged of the first class recently in Paris is named "Paresse" and is the result of four and a half months of work by Mr. Parker.

"Art is like everything else," said Mr. Parker in discussing his success. "A person must have an aptitude for it and he must learn to work hard. An artist must learn his trade, just as a cabinetmaker must. He must learn how to use his tools; then if he has anything to express he can do it. It is highly important that the young artist get started right so that he will have nothing to unlearn. He must also determine to stick to it." Mr. Parker explained that the victories he has had in various competitions came because he studied the conditions under which the prizes were to be awarded and then definitely made an attempt to do better than anyone else in that contest. "So many artists fail to stick at their work if they don't win the first time. If one succeeds once in seven times he ought to be satisfied."

"Paresse" is a practical working out of the theories of Mr. Parker in regard to persistent work in art. He says if he had quit a week before he did the painting probably would not have brought him a prize. He frequently invited friends on whose judgment he relied to view the picture as it progressed, and he attempted to correct faults which they pointed out. He scraped off and repainted a number of times the head of the girl represented in the picture in an effort to get just the right position and adjustment of light. The hair was reddish and in an endeavor to prevent the color from becoming too prominent he repainted that part of the picture a number of times. In fact the whole canvass was scraped off and done again after Mr. Parker had completed the painting.

Religious Encouragements in France

BY HENRI MERLE D'AUBIGNE

THOSE interested in evangelistic work in France have lately had proof of the progress which this cause has made during the last quarter century. Rev. George Boissonnas, director of the Societe Centrale Evangelique (Home Missionary Society), took upon himself the arduous task of convening an evangelistic conference in Paris. This had not been done since a similar conference, presided over by M. Louis Sautter, honorary president of the MacAll mission, was held twenty-six years ago. Since then the situation has been considerably changed by the disestablishment and disendowment of both the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches. Evangelistic work in the cities is probably more difficult now than it used to be, but the country districts have been opened to the preaching of the gospel as they never were before.

Whereas a quarter of a century ago preaching in any other place but one of the established churches was not lawful, and might bring complications, state interference has now come to an end. It has been possible to introduce more modern methods of evangelistic work, such as the use of tents, chapel boats, etc. On the other hand, it is certain that during these twenty-five years there has been a marked increase of infidelity among the people, the principal reason being that a new generation has come to the front which has gone to school, but has had very little moral training. How can we best take advantage of the freedom that we enjoy to cure the ills which our people are suffering? Such was the question which was put before the conference, and to it many interesting answers were given.

Most of the morning and afternoon sessions of this year's convention were held in the Wesleyan chapel, Rue Roquepine, the evening sessions in the fine St. Esprit church just opposite. Among the speakers were Professor Henri Bois, Pastor Charles Wagner and M. Gaston Riou, author of "Aux Ecoutes de la France qui vient" ("Hearkening for the Coming France").

A few years ago a distinguished Roman Catholic priest said: "It is a mistake to consider the Paris parishes as ordinary parishes. They are really missionary districts." This word of Father Soulange Bodin can be applied not only to Paris but to the greater part of France. Out of 40,000,000 inhabitants there are less than 5,000,000 that can really be considered as Roman Catholics. The others are indifferent or hostile to religion, because they know it only under its Roman form. The Roman Church, however, is waking up and making a considerable effort to take hold of the young. It is all the more the duty of the evangelical churches to present to the people the message of saving grace and spiritual power through the Holy Spirit.

As could be gathered from the papers that were read at this conference, and the comments that were made, there is a growing feeling in France that a mission must either be in intimate contact with an organized church, or that it must itself become a church.

The first method is mostly employed by the MacAll mission, which generally works in places where there are one or more churches. The second is the favorite method of the Societe Centrale of the new Methodist Episcopal mission in southern France and of the Welsh missions in Brittany, all of which labor in places where Christianity is represented only by the Roman Catholic Church. At present it is more especially in the great working class districts that evangelistic work has made headway. Such has been the case in such cities as Paris, Lille, Rouen, etc., where missions similar to the modern British mission institutes have been established and do good work. Successful evangelistic work has been done among the miners in the north of France.

Till lately mission work in the country districts had in general a pretty polemical character, but now that infidelity has made enormous strides among the peasantry, the enemy is everywhere recognized to be free thinking materialism. Different methods are being used to bring the gospel to the farmers. The MacAll mission has its mission boats and motor. The Episcopal Methodists use tents and hold in them regular church services among a farming population in Savoy, that till quite lately seemed nearly shut against any evangelistic effort.

During this last quarter of a century temperance work has taken a very important part in every evangelistic effort. There are places in France where, just as in some parts of Africa "Christian" means a "total abstainer," so "Protestant" means the same. Such is the case especially in the black districts of the north, where the Societe Centrale and the McAll mission are at work, and on the southwest coast of Brittany, where the Welsh Presbyterians are laboring among their Breton cousins.

The conference has shown that it is more necessary for modern evangelists to meet intellectual men on an equal footing than used to be the case years ago. In this our situation is similar to that of the Christians of the third century, who had to make front both against infidelity and against philosophical heathenism. At present we have to answer the attacks of the infidel preachers who endeavor to convince the common people that Christianity is identical with blind superstition and oppression. We also have to refute the arguments of the modern Roman philosophy, that it is unpatriotic for a Frenchman to be anything else but a Catholic, unreasonable and unsocial not to think and to do as the church has taught from age to age.

No doubt the Bible will always remain the center of the teaching that will be given to the evangelist of the future, but to be able to teach the people he will have to know many things that have not been considered till now as being the business of a preacher.

The conference was fittingly closed by services in the mission tent that has been opened not far from the Porte Maillot.

Value of Specialization in Giving

BY WILLIAM H. SCOTT

Both givers and those who seek gifts in the interest of good causes will find subject for thought in these observations by a distinguished Presbyterian layman and successful business man.

NEVER were there so many appeals for money made to the Christian man and woman as at present. So great are these appeals, and so ably presented, that one with a big heart concludes that the last cause to which attention is called is the greatest of all. But even the person with consecrated wealth, unless enormously rich, is unable to respond to every appeal which is made. Some persons and objects should occupy first place, and doubtless there will be conscientious and careful giving to such. After these, what about the numerous appeals knocking at the heart for admission?

Here is an opportunity for the exercise of wisdom on the part of the suppliant as well as of the giver. What appeals to one has no attraction for another. Benevolence has its tastes as well as the body or the mind. Of course many, in order to escape giving, will say they are not interested, or the cause does not appeal to them, but this article does not take such into consideration. The miser, the selfish man, the one who loves money, usually falls back on lack of interest, simply to get out of giving at all. In the case, however, of real givers, home missions may appeal to some more than foreign missions, church extension more than education, negroes more than Italians, hospitals more than schools. One man has no money for the higher education of the negro, but will give for his industrial education, while on the other hand, some recognize the importance of training ministers and leaders for the colored race, and therefore the higher institutions of learning appeal to them. Some will give to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, but not to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

Acting on the principle that everybody cannot give to everything, and that certain causes appeal to some more than to others, there must be specialization in giving. An Irish minister comes to this country to get money for a church or manse in Ireland. A German, for instance, would be excused for not contributing, and could properly say to the clergyman, "Go to persons who were born in the north of Ireland, or to those who are descended from the men of Ulster." Colleges that are appealing for funds should interest first of all the alumni, and the fathers and mothers and sons and daughters of graduates. An alumnus of a certain college should certainly be exempted from contributing to another college, so long as his own alma mater is in need of money. A hospital in one's own town has claims that another hospital a few miles away does not possess. Many more illustrations could be given.

Benevolent agencies must have money, and appeals must be made. As regards printed matter, which is now being used so extensively, there is great waste, as judgment is not used in its dissemination. Many go on the principle that you cannot tell which will prosper, whether this or that, and therefore send circulars broadcast. This plan, however, is certainly not wise when it comes to personal appeal. The suppliant should seek to know who are most likely to respond to requests for money for a given cause, and by so doing more will be secured because of concentration and specialization.

As to the benevolently disposed, there must be a choice of objects on which to bestow their benefactions. The giver should not only seek to know if the cause is a worthy one, but should determine whether it has special claims upon him, and whether other persons might not be appealed to who would respond quickly to a call for this purpose. To state it plainly, and by way of illustration, application is made for the support of a rescue home to one who believes in the redemption and reformation of those who are literally in the gutter. Not only will he contribute himself, but knowing certain persons who are deeply concerned in the salvation of the fallen, the names of such will be given, and like as not there will be a generous response.

This article is simply suggestive, and the subject may be succinctly stated as follows: There are many good causes appealing for money; few persons can give to all of them; there must be discrimination; appeals should be made only to those who are likely to respond; let one choose the objects in which he has special interest and give to them. As to other causes, to which one does not feel called to contribute, he may give advice and encouragement freely to those who are interested.

When the Son of man shall sit on his throne and shall say, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me," it does not follow that feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting the sick, going to the prison, were all done by the same person, for the Saviour promised a reward even to the one who should give a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple.

Christ believed in specialization in giving, for he told the rich young man to "go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor." On the other hand, he commended the woman who spent her money on an alabaster box of ointment which might have been sold for more than 300 pence and the money been given to the poor.

The purpose of this article is not to restrict giving or to curtail benevolence, but to so direct it that there shall be a wise and judicious distribution of money by those who are disposed to give.

Taking Our Religion on the Train with Us

WHEN CHRISTIANITY TRAVELS

BY PRISCILLA LEONARD

In The Continent of June 5 Miss Leonard raised the question, Should a Christian use the Sunday trains? She now asks whether the Christian while traveling comports himself as a citizen of God's kingdom—or does he leave Christian conduct behind him when he climbs into a railway coach? What do you yourself think—or do?

IN FRONT of us in the crowded passenger coach a seat was turned over, so as to make a double seat. A big, aggressive man sat on one, a determined-looking woman on the other. There was a baggage rack above, but it was not used. Two suitcases and a bag were piled on the vacant seats so as to render it impossible to take them. A weary-looking woman went by with a baby in her arms and a tiny 3-year-old dragging at her skirt, but there was no place for her.

"And he's one of the trustees of our church!" said the girl sitting next to me. "I traveled with them once, up to Niagara falls, and I was ashamed all the while, the way he and his wife grabbed seats and were rude to people. She belongs to the lookout committee of the church, and she certainly knows how to look out—for herself!"

The tide of travel ebbed and flowed. At least twenty persons looked longingly at those barricaded seats. The seats did not belong to the Christian pair. It was a plain case of selfish usurpation and entire disregard of the rights of others. One woman did pause, boldly, and ask if the seats were taken, but the trustee and his wife glared at her so disdainfully that her nerve failed and she hurried on farther. This spectacle of Christian living was presented to the world all the way to New York. When the train rolled into the station the trustee picked up the suitcases, his wife the bag, and they pushed through the aisles, driving all before them on pain of bodily injury. They were Christians—but they were traveling.

When Home Restraints and Habits Are Gone

It has been said, by acute observers of human nature, that to know people as they really are, one must travel with them. At home a thousand restraints and habits of behavior hedge men and women around. Travel changes all this. It gives freedom to the action and loose reins to the disposition. The essential self comes out as everything else is left in the distance. Tried by this test, how does the modern Christian appear? How much of Christianity is left behind and how much of it is carried along?

Some light may be thrown on the question by the remarks of a young train boy on a transcontinental train. I met him on the trip to San Francisco, and he told me the story of his life—he may have been 17 at the time, a gentle, delicate youth. "I came on the cars when I was a kid—just 14," he said. "Father and mother both died and I hadn't anywhere to go, and my cousin got me the job. It ain't very hard when you once get accustomed to the public—but say, at first I thought I couldn't stand the public! It's something fierce!"

He knew, for he had had three years of close contact. It was the Christian public, too—transcontinental travel is eminently respectable. But it was the traveling public, that had mostly left its Christianity in its home town, and had none to spare for the homeless, sensitive orphan boy. All the Christian influence that lad could get had to be brought to him on the train—that was the saddest part of it. The citizens of the kingdom of Christ did not bring its atmosphere and its laws with them, so how was he to know about its glory?

Yet the kingdom of Christ ought to have jurisdiction over every train that runs in a Christian land. No Christian has a right to be discourteous or selfish on a train. A Christian, while traveling as a tourist or commuter, is as much a Christian as regards duties and spirit as when he or she sits in a pew on Sundays. The more our trains multiply the more Christianity should leaven the incessant roar and rush of them.

Nor is such leaven unnoticed. "There's a Christian, I tell you!" said a habitual traveler on a local train as an elderly man rose and gave his seat to a tired-looking woman. "He'll never sit down while anyone else needs a seat, and he helps folks with their baskets often. If I'd seen her I'd have given her my seat first, so's to let him keep his. But he always sees them first—that's the kind he is." The church which that Christian commuter attended was daily the richer for his quiet membership—was it not?

Not only on trains but in tourist resorts the traveling Christian who is a real Christian is badly needed. A minister's wife, in a small town among the beautiful northern hills, once said to the writer with heartfelt earnestness:

"We dread the summer visitor in our church. My husband has this small church, and he does his best. He has few books, and has to cover long distances in his pastoral visits. He cannot prepare eloquent sermons up to the city mark, of course. But when the summer people come half of them stay away from church entirely and say openly that 'he isn't worth coming to hear.' That's bad enough. But some of those who come are worse still, for they laugh at his sermons and criticise them to our regular members. The summer colony is extravagant, careless in behavior and laughs at 'village ideas' of Sunday. My husband says that the few good, sincere Christians who come to our church each summer and really try to help us along are not enough to make up for the disorganizing effect of the rest on the church and the village. Yet I know most of them are church folks at home and behave themselves differently. Why should they be so different here?"

Why, indeed? Which is the real self—the supposedly Christian one at home or the well-nigh unchristian one at the summer resort? Does it seem unpleasant to say that the latter is the actual, unconcealed, real personality? If it seems unkind, isn't it true all the same? Is a man a Christian at all until his Christianity goes deeper than habits, and remains as living in July as in January? Can a woman be a Christian worker at home and an unchristian influence on the porch of a summer cottage? Is not the outsider right who judges Christianity by its summer fruits? Perhaps one reason why religion is pushed to the wall in many places is because Christian visitors help to push it there, consciously or unconsciously.

Christianity Began as a Traveling Religion

Yet Christianity was started as a traveling religion. Before railways were dreamed of it traveled on foot along every road. It went from Palestine to Rome on land and water. It trudged along African desert paths and through Gothic wilderness. Everybody who traveled with the early Christians found that a new kingdom had begun to extend its boundaries through these travelers. Some of them were soldiers, tramping in the Roman legions and talking to their fellows as they tramped. Some of them were pioneers, tilling and delving in new countries. Some of them were pilgrims for Christ's sake. Some of them were teachers of the new faith to savage tribes which were to become mighty nations. But always they carried every ounce of their Christianity with them. They were the most Christian Christians the church had; and so they annexed the world as they went.

To that ideal the Christian church must ever return in teaching her sons and daughters of today. The church member who feels Christian obligation slip from the shoulders as the train pulls out of the station is a danger to the kingdom of Christ. The Christian who in a railroad car or on an excursion boat puts Christ to open shame by selfish, careless behavior is an enemy to the cross.

A woman of wealth, a consistent member of Christ's church, was urged by her husband—not so consistent a member—who had bought a new automobile, to go on Sunday trips with him. "John," she said, "you may be able to worship God in an automobile, but I can't!" There are a good many Christians besides John who need to think this reply over. It covers a field of travel, new but constantly expanding, that needs Christianization. It needs it, too, not only with regard to Sunday observance but to consideration of the rights of others on the public highways. A Christian automobile owner ought not to be a danger to the life and the property of others; ought not to deliberately break the law of the speed limit; ought not to be a byword for discourtesy on the road.

When Christianity travels it should be an object lesson to the world, whether it goes on foot, in the trolley, on the train, or by motor car; and such object lessons never fail of result to the glory of God.

The Minister Who Wants to "Move On"

at least twice each Sunday; "say a few words" in the young people's society; make a talk in the midweek meetings; "address" the Sunday school—unless the wisdom of the superintendent realizes the peril; occasionally make a few other talks between times just to keep his hand—or mouth?—in. Verily it would seem that the church considers garrulity the chief asset for a minister. In olden days when religious literature was scarce and the reading people few it was necessary for the chief instruction to come from the minister. Those times have happily passed. But still must the minister spend at least a half of his time preparing something to say to a handful of people who, deep down in their hearts, would just as soon he wouldn't. I would not belittle the preaching of the word; the rather I would magnify the value of Bible study. It is undoubtedly true that the preaching service does not make as strong appeal as it once did; but the Sunday school, given exclusively to Bible study, is strength. Wisdom would seem to suggest the throwing of the greatest effort into the channel of strongest appeal.

4. The minister is not divine that he should be above criticism. But he has consecrated himself to the service of the Master for the people. Censorious criticism will wound him in spite of all he can do. As previously intimated, he should throw off ordinary criticism; but when the fangs of venom strike in merely for the joy of criticising censoriously, to endure is beyond human forbearance. Many a church has lost a valuable minister because of its constant picayunish criticism.

5. Restricted liberty in leadership is a cross upon which many ministers are crucified to the community. Too many churches hire a servant instead of calling a leader. The minister is supposed to be a specialist in church leadership. The whole trend of his education has been in that direction; particularly true is this of the three years spent in the theological seminary. In addition to the time given to his technical education he has perhaps spent several years in developing and trying out ideas, methods, plans. Because of his years of preparation, his years of experience and his supposed ability as a specialist he is asked to become the minister of the church that it may be led to greater usefulness. Yet it is not the unusual thing for this trained specialist to be given, politely, of course, to understand that he is supposed to fall into the rut regardless of any better possibilities. The minister may have had experience in a number of churches and under various conditions; but the fruit of his experience is of no value when placed in the balance with the necessarily narrow ideas of men and women who have had no practical knowledge of church work outside their own congregation. The minister who finds that instead of being an accredited leader he is relegated to the position of phonographic flunky will naturally get restless in a very little while. The church boss, whether in pulpit or pew, is more reprehensible than the boss in politics. The minister who is fit to be a minister must have freedom in leadership else he will seek freedom in flight. Some churches have never in all their history had a minister whom they did not drive away through their restrictions.

It would not require any great diligence to add other items to the indictment of the church; but perhaps this is sufficient to make some of them realize something of their shortcomings.

Wherein are we to find the cure for this twofold malady resulting in ministerial restlessness? Let the ministry conscientiously study its faults, and with equal conscientiousness let the churches examine themselves. Ministerial restlessness has been caused by a destructive cooperation between ministers and churches; for this let us have the substitution of a constructive cooperation.

Trust

With sails all set and filled with gentlest air,
  I watch the ship glide peacefully along;
No engine's throb, no toil of arm is there,
  The might of God compels, unseen and strong.

With toiling and with trials sore distressed,
  O weary soul, learn nature's truth aright;
Thy God will give thee of his perfect rest,
  If thou commit thy weakness to his might.

Advice for Farmers Old and Rich

Professor P. G. Holden, the agricultural expert of the International Harvester Company, who has been lecturing in the West on crop topics, particularly alfalfa, in addition to his lecture on alfalfa gives some good advice to his farmer hearers. Among other things he says:

"When you have grown old and rich on the farm, don't move to town. A retired farmer is a nuisance in town, when he moves there simply to die cheap. He is against all improvements, because such things cost money and he wants to keep his taxes down. Stay on your farm. Don't buy more land, but improve what you have. Put in a system of water works, so you can take a bath once in a while. Put in a lighting plant, so you can read newspapers and books without straining your eyes, and keep well informed. Stay on your farms, and when you finally pay the debt of nature your friends and neighbors will regret your death and there will be a procession half a mile long follow you to your grave. But if you move to town you won't have much of a procession and the neighbors will say that it is a good thing the close-fisted old codger is out of the way."

Why the Big Ones Were on Top

The old farmer was making his usual weekly call on Mrs. Wiggins, says The Chicago Daily News.

"P'taters is good this mornin', madam," he said, casting an admiring look at the basketful he had brought.

"Oh, is they?" retorted Mrs. Wiggins. "That reminds me. I wants to have a word with you about them you sold me last week. How is it that them at the bottom o' the basket is so much smaller than them at the top?"

"Come about like this," replied old John, a knowing look on his face. "P'taters is growin' that fast now that by the time I get a basketful dug the last ones is about twice the size of the first!"

Germany to America by Wireless

Longer and longer grow the distances over which wireless telegraph messages can be sent. The original Marconi company now has several rivals, and one of these, the Goldschmidt company, is accomplishing some astonishing feats, according to The Nation, London:

"Within the last few days the Goldschmidt people have managed to establish a communication for 3,600 miles from Hanover in Germany to Atlantic City in America, and it is claimed that the current is strong enough to send a message 1,600 miles farther still."

A Man's Privilege

As little Freddie had reached the mature age of 3, and was about to discard petticoats for manly raiment in the form of knickerbockers, his mother determined to make the occasion a memorable one.

The fledgling was in ecstasies as he appeared at the dinner table. Displaying his garments to full advantage, he edged close to his mother, and whispered, "Mummie, can I call pa Bill now?"

Mike—"Do yez believe in the recall of judges, Pat?"

Pat—"That I do not. The last time I was up before his honor he sez: 'I recall that face. Sixty days.' I am agin the recall of judges."—Life.

THE HOME COUNCIL

Appreciating the Children's Efforts

BY ANNE GUILBERT MAHON

"HURRY, EDGAR, you will be late for kindergarten," called an anxious mother, running out to the doorstep with her little boy's kindergarten basket containing the luncheon she had just prepared.

"See, mother, how clean I have swept the steps!" exclaimed the little fellow with pride, holding up his broom and pointing to the neatly swept steps.

"You haven't soiled your clean suit, I hope?" For the moment the mother ignored the steps and the eager face of the boy as she closely scanned the suit which she had cautioned him to "keep clean for kindergarten."

"But see the steps, mother! Don't you think I am a good boy?" he persisted eagerly.

Then it dawned on the mother that in the midst of her hurry to clear away breakfast, tidy up and get the children off for school in time she was neglecting a duty perhaps as important as any of the others, and she bestowed on the little fellow the words of loving commendation for which he was looking, for which he had worked so hard with his little broom, and he went off to kindergarten with a radiant face and a happy heart.

So often we busy mothers fail to appreciate our children's efforts. Like Martha of old, we are anxious and troubled about many things. We rush from one duty to another. To be sure, we cannot notice everything when our minds and hearts and hands are so full, but when we stop to realize what it means to a child to have his small efforts appreciated and encouraged we shall be careful never to let an opportunity pass to notice and to commend his hard work—for it is hard work for little hands—and his thoughtful service.

We know how it feels ourselves to do things for people and then have our efforts utterly ignored. Such an experience rather dampens one's ardor for service and makes one feel that it is really not worth while to be helpful when our endeavors apparently miss fire. If we grown folks feel so over our efforts, how much more must the little child, who takes everything in such sober earnest, and who, when he tries to do a thing or works over a thing, puts his whole energy and heart and mind into it? Many a childish impulse to help is crushed by the unintentional thoughtlessness of the mother who is too busy to see and to appreciate her little one's efforts. Such a course will, in time, stifle all impulse on the part of the child to "help mother," and to do little unsefish acts for others.

Some time ago there was printed a story about a mother who failed to appreciate her daughter's efforts, and the miserable, starved life the little girl led, trying her best to please, yet always seeming to do the wrong thing and being reprimanded for it. The climax was reached when the child tried to make a bed to surprise her mother. The story protrayed vividly her hard, painstaking efforts, her delight when she pictured mother's surprise on seeing the bed so carefully made; but when the mother did come into the room, in the hurry of her morning's work, she had only the sharp exclamation to make, "There! You have gone and made the bed, and it is the day to change the bedclothing," while in a fit of irritation she tore off the clothes and undid all the hard, patient work of the little one. It was the last straw. The child rushed out into the hall, blinded by her tears, and fell headlong down the stairway. Her life was not sacrificed, but the accident awakened the mother to a consciousnes of her failure to give appreciation where appreciation was due. She never again depreciated or overlooked her little one's efforts to please her.

This is an extreme case, of course. Few mothers would go to such an extreme, but when we are very busy or burdened or anxious, it is so easy to overlook the little things which our children do to please us—crude efforts, hindering, perhaps, instead of helping us in our work, but nevertheless, efforts made with the desire to help, to please, to "surprise." It would be a pity if any one of us should thus blight the bud of helpfulness which, when grown-up years come, might otherwise blossom into that spirit of unselfish service which the world so greatly needs. To give appreciation and commendation where they are due is a very small return for the loving thought which goes into childish service; and it means a little heart warmed and encouraged to further effort for others.

So Why Fret?

Are the trains too slow for you? Cæsar, with all of his court, never exceeded the speed limit.

Are your wages too small? In Europe people are content with making a living.

Are the lights too dim? David wrote his psalms by the light of a smoky torch.

Are you ugly? Cleopatra, though homely, bewitched two emperors.

Are you cold? The soldiers of Valley Forge walked barefoot on the ice and snow.

Are you hungry? Children in India are starving for want of a crust of bread.

Are you tired? Why fret about it? Jacob was tired when he dreamed of the angels of heaven.

Are you sick? Suppose you had lived two thousand years ago, when sickness was almost always fatal.

Are you poor? The Saviour of men was not wealthy.

Cheer up! Praise God that you live in the midst of his blessings.

Why fret?—The American Magazine.

Scented Breeze for a Hot Day

A woman who has been visiting friends in torrid lands says they have learned many ways of making extreme heat endurable that might profitably be imitated by dwellers in more temperate climes.

A part of her time was spent in a bungalow which was surrounded by doors and in which the windows were all skylights. Both of these means of communication with the outer air were generally kept tightly closed during the hottest part of the day, but in cases of very great heat frames filled with a sweet-smelling fiber took the place of the doors on the side on which the wind was blowing. The fiber was constantly sprinkled with water, causing a cool and scented breeze to enter the bungalow.

The visitor was so charmed with the effect of this arrangement that in her own country house, when there is a spell of tropical weather, she now opens all the windows on the windward side and sprinkles the muslin curtains with scented water.

Verses Old and New

"PRAY ONE FOR ANOTHER"

I cannot tell why there should come to me
  A thought of some one miles and miles away,
In swift insistence on the memory,
  Unless a need there be that I should pray.

Too hurried oft are we to spare the thought,
  For days together, of some friends away;
Perhaps God does it for us, and we ought
  To read his signal as a call to pray.

Perhaps, just then, my friend has fiercer fight,
  And more appalling weakness, and decay
Of courage, darkness, some lost sense of right;
  And so, in case he needs my prayer, I pray.

Friend, do the same for me. If I intrude
  Unasked upon you, on some crowded day,
Give me a moment's prayer as interlude;
  Be very sure I need it; therefore pray.

—Marianne Farmingham.

An Old Tale Retold

The day was drawing to a close. Judge, jurors, witnesses and lawyers—all were growing weary. Counsel for the prosecution was cross-examining the defendant.

"Exactly how far is it between the two towns?" he asked at length.

For some time the man sat thinking; then:

"About four miles as the cry flows," came the answer.

"You mean as the flow cries!" retorted the man of law.

The judge leaned forward.

"No," he remarked, suavely, "he means as the fly crows."

And they all looked at one another, feeling that something was wrong somewhere.

No Left-Overs Where He Dined

Mr. Bilderson prided himself on his good appetite. He was dining with a friend recently and did his best to keep his host and hostess, with their 6-year-old daughter, amused, and at the same time managed to do ample justice to the good things provided.

"Oh, dear, Mr. Bilderson," remarked the little one, after the guest's wittiest sally, "I wish you'd come here to dinner every day!"

Bilderson beamed satisfaction. "Do you, dear?" he smiled. "Why?"

"'Cause," came the reply, as the observant maiden glanced round the table, "'cause there wouldn't be anything cold to eat the next day."

How Shall We Help Our Girls?

IF OUR young men are to be strong in their purity through our Lord Jesus Christ, what can the girls from our Christian homes do to help them?

How many bright, interesting girls are there for company for our boys who, by thought, word and deed, hold their own purity to be the finest, and thereby strengthen the character of their companions?

What can we Christian mothers do for our daughters that they "may be as corner stones polished after the similitude of a palace"?

J. B.

[To know is to be strong. The first duty of any mother, and especially of any Christian mother, of girls is to teach her daughters the meaning of their womanhood and the sacredness of their privileges as women. Social workers who have the grim problem of social purity in the large to deal with insist that when young people are properly instructed in the facts and phenomena of life and being, the "boy problem" and "girl problem" will be greatly lessened. Such instruction should, of course, come first from the parents. When our young women, as a result of this instruction, come to a realizing sense of what their influence really is over their young men friends, just why it is they err in allowing acts of familiarity, harmless perhaps in themselves, which may result in hardly resisted temptation, they can much better, "by thought, word and deed," exercise that influence, strongly and sanely and conscientiously, for good. The time sometimes comes in a girl's life when the mother's admonitions and warnings, followed by "Mother knows best," lose their weight. She feels it is time that she decided some things for herself, and in her ignorance and her desire for independence she may kindle a flame which will scar her for life. Simple, scientific knowledge, sweetly and honestly given by her mother, would have been her safeguard. Surely the Christian home, and not the playmate or chum, should be the source of such knowledge.]

How Mrs. Burnett Plays Dolls

BY ROSALIE DE WOLFE

IF YOU were calling with your mother on Mrs. Burnett, the author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy," at her beautiful home on Long island, New York, Mrs. Burnett would probably say to your mother: "Do excuse me one moment. There is something I want your little daughter to see while we are enjoying our chat." Then she would take your hand and lead you past the beautiful paintings on the walls, past the curious old shields and odd carvings, straight to one corner of the big, bright room where there is a solid old cabinet made in England years and years ago.

A dark old wooden cabinet may seem rather uninteresting, but just wait until Mrs. Burnett flings open the cabinet door and there—it isn't a cabinet after all! It's a doll house. Peep inside. The cabinet shelf divides the house into two floors—an upstairs and a downstairs part. The upper right hand room is the nursery. There a fat, comfortable-looking old nurse doll is making two doll youngsters ready for a walk or a drive. Over in the other corner is a tiny white bathtub, just like a real baby's, only many times smaller. It has everything that a real baby's tub should have, even to a shower bath attachment. In the tub sits the baby doll of the family, with a red-cheeked young nurse maid bending over him.

The next upstairs room belongs to the young lady doll of the household. There she is, evidently all ready for a party, for she has on a very pretty party frock. She is taking a last look at herself in the mirror of her dressing table to see if every curl is in place. On her dressing table is a most wonderful doll's outfit of toilet articles. There is the weest manicure set in the world, a little hand mirror, perfume bottles, a pincushion, in fact, everything to help to make a young lady doll attractive. Everything in this room is as dainty as the young lady doll herself, even to her pretty white bed and the dotted muslin curtains at the window.

Downstairs the grown-ups of this doll family are having dinner. They are sitting about a well spread table and seem to be heartily enjoying the meal. The father of the family looks as if he were telling a funny story and the maid, waiting on the table, is having a hard time to keep a straight face. The minister is a guest at this merry meal.

If you have read Mrs. Burnett's delightful story called "Racketty-Packetty House," this house would set you thinking of the two doll houses in that amusing story. It is quite too tidy and well kept to be the shabby Racketty-Packetty house that little Cynthia would not keep neat and in order. It has "all the elegant chairs and tables and carpets and curtains and ornaments and pictures and bookcases" of Tidy castle, the beautiful new house that was given to Cynthia. But Tidy castle was the home of stiff, proud dolls that could never be played with comfortably. The dolls in Mrs. Burnett's house are not a bit like that. They look as if they were fairly aching to have some little girl play with them. Racketty-Packetty house must have looked like this before it became old and shabby.

Now, you will probably wonder why a grown-up person, even if she does know a great deal about doll houses, should keep one in her own drawing room. She would tell you that there are at least two good reasons for it.

When Mrs. Burnett was a little girl she was often taken by her elders to pay calls upon other grown-ups. She used to sit perched upon a high, straight-backed chair and wonder what the others found so interesting in these calls. She certainly found them very tiresome. Once in a while a kind lady would say. "Dear me, how I wish I had something to amuse little girls! You see, my little girls are such big girls now that their playthings are given away. Wouldn't you like to look at a book, my dear?"

But the book had no pictures of boys and girls in it and the reading was always uninteresting. So when Mrs. Burnett grew up she felt very sorry for children who have to go calling with their mothers and sit quietly listening to conversation that doesn't interest them in the least. She decided that this was never going to happen in her home. That is the first reason for the doll house. The second reason is this: It seems that Mrs. Burnett has been so busy writing stories for and about young folks that she has quite forgotten to grow too old to like dolls and toys. When she came across that solid old cabinet in a little town in Kent, England, she said to herself, "The very thing! I will get this cabinet, and whenever I see a toy that I cannot possibly resist, I will buy it to help fill my cabinet. Then, when children come to see me, we will open up the doors. The children will be happy, and so will I."

The Author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy"

Mrs. Burnett really enjoys the doll house quite as much as her small guests. In fact, she plays with it too, if making it over, adding a new chair here and a cushion there can be called playing. It was years ago that the cabinet was turned into a doll house, and just as in a real house the furniture has to be renewed or reupholstered and changed about.

Mrs. Burnett does not forget the boys, either. How could she, when she had two of her own? An upper shelf in the cabinet is devoted to their toys. There are engines and railroad tracks and all sorts of things that boys love.

Mrs. Burnett says that it is very hard for her to pass by the window of a toy shop. She likes to stop and gaze at the wagons, the baby carriages and the small chairs and tables just as if she were still a little girl in short skirts. She buys a great many toys to give away to the young people of her acquaintance.

But she loves dolls better than all the rest. She never can resist buying and naming them after boys and girls she knows. One of her dolls was named for the little daughter of the duchess of Sutherland. This doll had a serious accident—she broke her head and had to be taken to the Dolls' Nursing Home for an operation. But this misfortune turned out to be a blessing in disguise, for not only was the titled doll made quite as good as new but while Mrs. Burnett was at the hospital she found another doll, the loveliest she had ever met. She took her home and has kept her ever since.

Why do you suppose that Mrs. Burnett, a grown woman, loves dolls so much? Don't you believe that it is because she loves children so much—more even than the dolls?

How Frolic Came to the Zoo

FAR AWAY in Africa there was a valley where lived a little zebra only three months old. His name was Frolic. I think they named him this because he loved to play so well. He liked to run off through the tall grasses and come back to his mother; then he would go back again and would keep this up till he was so tired he had to lie down on the ground and rest. Frolic had beautiful black and yellow stripes all over him.

One day he ran too far and lost his way back to his mother, and before he had turned to try to find her a rope was thrown over his head and he was lassoed. He walked and walked, till the men brought him to a great ocean, and Frolic was taken on board a large ship.

Frolic had a long, long ride. One day the boat tossed very high and he thought he would never land again. After three weeks Frolic reached America. The man that had caught Frolic kept a zoo in Lincoln park, Chicago. This man's name was Brown. Mr. Brown had a little girl named Winifred. Winifred would call Frolic every morning before her breakfast and feed him his breakfast.

That first night he slept in Mr. Brown's barn in the hay and thought it was a fine bed. The next morning Mr. Brown took him to the zoo. Frolic thought he had never seen such a delightful place. There were monkeys and lions, tigers, and zebras that looked like himself, and all sorts of animals of all kinds. Frolic learned a few tricks and was the favorite of all the animals to Winifred. Her father loved the little zebra, too, and sometimes thought he should not have taken Frolic so soon from his mother in Africa. He sent some men to go and get her. When the men returned they did have Frolic's mother, and when they met, Frolic jumped and ran just like he did when he was three months old.

Frolic felt so proud when he walked through the zoo with his mother. He slept with her every night. It seemed to him like his home in Africa.

Mr. Brown gave Frolic and his mother a place in the zoo that was in between two hills to make it more like home.

THE OTHER HALF

BY ELIZABETH KNOBEL

The moon is very big and round,
And shiny through and through,
But, oh, dear me, tonight I found
'Twas broken right in two!

I took my little lantern light,
And with determined mind
I started out into the night
That other half to find.

I heard, as worried as could be,
The crickets' anxious tune;
The fireflies all joined with me
To find that half o' moon.

I woke the pansies in their beds,
But nothing could they tell;
The daisies sadly shook their heads—
They loved the dear moon well.

The marigolds with tears were wet—
Where did the half moon go?
I asked a night owl that I met;
He did not seem to know.

I searched the garden through with care,
I hunted far and wide,
Till, in the starry meadow there,
A little gleam I spied.

What could it be? I ran to look,
Then laughed a happy laugh,
For there, a-shining in the brook,
I found that other half!

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

August 24, 1913—The Bread from Heaven

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 15:27—16:36. Golden Text, John 6:35: Jesus said unto them, I am the bread of life.

The last time we saw Moses he was leading a triumphant chorus down by the sea. His sister Miriam, with her maidens, was also present, and with timbrel and dance joined in the song of thanksgiving and praise.

But life is more than a song. The timbrel does well enough for the dance, but it is a poor instrument to march by. Moses heard in the far distance the voice of Canaan calling his people; so he re-formed his lines and gave the word to advance. The way lay toward the desert, and a leader with less courage and faith might have hesitated to attempt the journey. With the character of the country he must have been familiar, for he had lived on its southern border. For three days they marched into the wilderness and found no water. At last an oasis appeared, but its waters proved too bitter for use.

Patience, Forbearance and Faith Sweeten Waters of Life

There is a well some thirty miles down the coast whose waters answer to the above. Cattle refuse to drink from it and even the Arabs object to its unpleasant taste. Possibly this is the very well that proved such a great disappointment to the people. That they complained is not surprising. The Israelites appealed to Moses and he in turn appealed to God. The Almighty directed him to cast a certain tree into the waters and they at once became sweet. Just what tree that was we do not know. But there are a great many of the same kind growing in every dooryard. Patience is one, forbearance is another and faith is the best of all. The waters of life may become stagnant and bitter, but remedies lie all about us. Moses did as God directed and the offense was gone.

The people needed this very experience. Moses transformed it into a "statute and an ordinance," that it might be of service in the future. The lesson the Israelites were to forget, but even a forgotten blessing may not be without its uses. A drink from the well of Marah, especially at the beginning of the journey, prepares one for reverses yet to come. Bitterness, like everything else, is relative. The waters of the present are always sweet when compared with the Marah wells of other days.

After Rest at Elim, Israel Once More Faces Desert

But there are other springs in the desert than those of Marah. Elim, with its twelve wells and seventy palm trees, is not far away. There Israel encamped and in the luxury of its surroundings forgot the past. Rest is only temporary, however. Prolonged too far it becomes a weariness. Life is a march. Israel again faced the desert. Thirty days ago the people were in Egypt and the transition must have seemed like a dream. But a month may mean more than centuries. So it was with Israel. Everything had changed but human nature.

Once more the people murmured against Moses and Aaron, this time not because of thirst, but for hunger. The memories of Egypt come back like benedictions, and the fleshpots of their servitude seemed like a banquet when seen through the glare of the desert. Dissatisfaction always breeds gloomy forebodings and the people saw before them nothing but death.

There was in their attitude a strange blending of piety and resentfulness, which unfortunately continued. They regretted not having died by the "hand of Jehovah in the land of Egypt," instead of having been brought by Moses and Aaron into the desert to starve. The phrase "hand of Jehovah" seemed pious, and to lay the responsibility at the tent of Moses relieved them of all blame.

No one wishes to be misrepresented, and Moses determined to impress upon the people that it was God and not he who had delivered them from the Egyptians. That idea runs through the entire narrative. No one ever emphasized more strongly than Moses the personality of God. Jehovah was always the same distinctive being with whom he talked face to face. Bread was to fall from heaven and flesh to come out of the air. Each morning the Israelites were to gather bread, and on the sixth day sufficient for the seventh. The fourth commandment had not yet been given, but the Sabbath is older than recorded history.

As the people listened to Aaron, they looked toward the wilderness, "and, behold, the glory of Jehovah appearing in the cloud." God flashed his presence across the sky and set ablaze the treatening cloud—a fit symbol of what he is ever ready to do. And in the morning when the dew was gone there lay upon the ground a small, round thing like unto frost. The people said one to another, "What is it?" And Moses said, "It is the bread which Jehovah hath given you to eat." And for forty years, until the people reached Canaan, the manna continued to fall. God never does for a man what he may do for himself. The manna supply began and ended in the desert.

Manna of the Wilderness a Symbol of the Living Manna

This miracle has occasioned the widest discussion. Some have sought to lay it to the operations of nature, but with no satisfactory result. It belongs to the miraculous and there it must rest. Jesus made it symbolic of himself. The world was a moral desert and he the living manna that came down to supply the starving soul. The figure is far reaching. The service was daily, some gathering "more, some less," as the world does still. The quail supply has made no such impression as has the manna, which finds its counterpart in the Christ. This world would be dreary enough but for manna showers that have fallen from time to time.

The Bible itself is a greater miracle than any ever recorded. As a pillar of fire and smoke, it has led the way of civilization as truly as was Moses led through the desert. The end came at last for the fathers, but it has not come to the children; and not until the last pilgrim has reached the eternal border will special providence cease to be.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—Americans have learned how useless it is to try to form a self-governing state out of a race just escaped from servitude. Discipline, moral training and practice in self-government are all needed as a preparation. Israel went to school forty years in the wilderness before the nation was fitted to cross the Jordan and enter upon its great career.

These are the people who have just been singing. The song has hardly died away from their lips when they begin to murmur. They murmured at Marah because the waters are bitter, and now they murmur in the wilderness because the food runs short. It is easy to sing with fervor when things are going just to suit us. But such a song is emptiness. We know such people as soon as they accost us, and we can tell how their business is going by their manner. Just one month had elapsed since this people escaped from bondage. It is difficult to have a piety that is four-square, permanent in its dignity, independent of all circumstances; a piety founded upon a rock and lifting up its pinnacles to the sky, defying all wind and thunder and tumult of the elements—but until we realize such a piety as that our education is incomplete.—Joseph Parker.

Such is the frequent experience of renewed souls, when privilege and joy are followed by trouble from without or within; and the peace of God is broken by the strife of tongues, by mental anxieties, by temptations, by physical pain. It is quite as strange that our soul divine should be marred by paltry disturbances when once that life has become a realized experience, as that men who had moved under the shadow of that marvelous cloud could be so easily beset by fear for their supplies.—Prebendary Chadwick.

Complaining Spirit Complains Most of Its Best Friend

Verse 1—Think what royal favors Moses and Aaron had renounced that they might deliver Israel. These leaders felt at times that the more they sacrificed for Israel the more they were hated by the people (I. Cor. 12:15).

Verse 3—The children of Israel said that had they died in Egypt they would at least have died "full." It would have been better, so they now said, to have fallen in that dreadful night when the firstborn perished (Ex. 12:29) than to live only to die here by slow starvation. Mr. Beecher tells of passing the splendid mansion of a very rich New Yorker with a man in humble circumstances, who murmured at the partiality of the Lord in placing this neighbor in affluence but consigning himself to poverty. But when his pastor asked about the four boys which the poor man had and the rich man lacked, occasion for gratitude seemed suddenly reversed. Two young friends were passing up 5th avenue, New York, one hot July day, when they saw two painters hard at work in the blazing sun painting the eaves of a mansion from a suspended platform. One said, "John, why were not we born to live in such a palace as that?" To which the other replied, "You tell me first why we were not born to paint it." If it is easy always to find occasion for murmurings, it is quite as easy, if we should look, to find reasons for praise.

Latter Day Miracle Resembles Miracle of the Manna

Verse 4—During the Black Hawk war in northern Illinois (1832) the settlers near the fort at Apple river heard of the swift approach of the Indians, who were out raiding and murdering as they swept through the unprotected settlements. They immediately left their fields and found refuge in the fort. One family in particular was greatly disturbed because a large field sown with wheat in the early spring had not even sprouted and it was now growing late. It had been their intention to replow the ground and to sow some other grain the next day. But the attack of the Indians prevented. After the war was ended and the family returned to their desolated home they found this field in full ear, and its splendid abundance saved them from the pinch of famine all the succeeding winter. Had it sprung up earlier the Indians would have destroyed it. Was that wonderful deliverance a miracle?

Verse 5—But in the midst of this abundance of bread from heaven the Israelites were still to remember their duty of worship. To emphasize that, a double portion of the manna fell upon the sixth day of the week.

Verse 6—Moses felt it was right the people should confess that whatever their fate, it was a decree of Jehovah. He himself had only acted for God. It was not be who had brought them out. It was Jehovah and from him would the deliverance come.

Nature Reveals God as Truly as Any Miracle

Verse 8—Too few persons make any study of the wonderful ways in which our commonest wants are supplied. One modern writer has said that the daily provisioning of a city is one of the most interesting studies he ever attempted. But a still more moving study, according to an eminent botanist, is the study of a single grain of the wheat from which we make our innumerable loaves of bread. Each tiny grain is so constructed as best to protect it from water and frost and sun until the time for germination comes. Each grain is wrapped in a number of delicate integuments of varying degrees of elasticity, and the delicate live germ is doubly protected by stiff vegetable hairs. And yet it takes billions upon billions of such triumphs of wisdom to supply a single city with its morning rolls. To the student of plant morphology a mouthful of bread speaks of God as truly as does an omer of manna.

Verse 10—A manifestation of the divine presence was granted to the people that the authority of Moses and Aaron might be strengthened. They could do nothing except by the cooperation of their fellows. To secure that new miracles were needed. Even in the midst of the late Indian wars the telegraph wires across the plains were undisturbed after the Indians had been shown their mysterious powers of transmitting communication.

Verses 13-15—The prophecies of Moses and Aaron were abundantly verified, and for the greater part of the forty years which the Israelites spent in the Sinaitic peninsula the people were submissive and obedient as a result of these divine displays.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning August 17, 1913

TOPIC—The tares. Matthew 13:24-30.

The disciples were passing through a period of disillusionment regarding the coming kingdom; and their experience was painful. They had been disappointed in their expectation of a kingdom of immediate magnificence, and this was perplexing. They were now more deeply disappointed in their hopes of a kingdom of perfect purity. John the Baptist had taught them plainly that when the Christ should appear the kingdom would begin with a thorough purging away of all wickedness. John's whole message was one of purification in preparation for the advent of Christ. His baptism was a baptism unto repentance, because the kingdom of heaven was at hand.

When Christ came, his kingdom came. It was already present when he spoke these words unto his disciples. He was now in the full tide of the most popular period of his earthly ministry. Multitudes were pressing after him, eager to proclaim his kingship. But the multitudes were not pure in heart, and the kingdom they would constitute would not be free from wickedness. No sooner was the kingdom announced, with all its high principle and pure endeavor, than unprincipled men took the words of Jesus and deflected them to give countenance to their own low aims. The imperfections of the kingdom in its appearance evidently caused much perplexity and confusion in the minds of the twelve. The parable of the tares amid the wheat was the explanation of Jesus.

The field is the world, not the church, as has sometimes been erroneously assumed. The sphere of the kingdom is wider than that of the church, for it comprehends the whole range of the interests of human life. It is in the world that the kingdom must ultimately be realized.

The seed sown is good—naturally, for the sower was Christ himself. Good seed sown in a field can bring forth only a harvest of good grain. As is the sowing, so must be the harvest. Wheat will issue in wheat, oats in oats and darnel in darnel. If only the field had remained as Christ had sown it the harvest would have been altogether excellent.

The most dastardly thing that could happen did happen. An enemy came in the night and sowed darnel among the wheat. It is hard for Christian men to understand the animus from which such conduct springs. But in the passionate East, with its implacable hatreds and its laws of retaliation, such a procedure is by no means unknown. The demoniacal wretch watched his opportunity for vengeance upon his unsuspecting neighbor. When the soil had been opened by the plowshare, and the good seed cast in the prepared ground, the lurking enemy issued forth in the night and cast darnel upon the tilled earth. The darnel would sprout more quickly and spread more widely than the wheat. Even the body of Roman law contained a paragraph treating of this form of wrongdoing, and prescribing its penalties.

The devil still stands at the door of the church and, as the worshipers leave the sacred place, purified and strengthened with holy thoughts, he whispers lies and blasphemies in their ears. The bad seeds have not been scattered by the master who owns the field but by his envious adversary.

Upon their first appearance on the ground the plants that spring from the good seeds and those that spring from the bad seeds are so much alike that the most experienced agriculturist of the land of the Bible cannot discern the difference. In like manner in the first upspringing of the tender plant, there are weeds of selfishness that look very much like forms of generosity; there are bad growths of pride that resemble humility; and shoots of self-importance that are nearly the same in appearance as those of public spirit.

As the blades grow into the stalks the servants of the Master are in a childish state of agitation about the appearance of the field. They ask him: "Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field?" Perhaps, after all, the Master had made a mistake about the seed! Impossible. The tares are the devil's own. Then the servants would impatiently root them up at once. But this cannot be done without damage to the good wheat; for the roots of the two kinds of seeds are intertwined.

Why not remove at once from the communion roll the name of yonder hypocrite? Let us not act hastily, brother. He has a godly sister, who is trying to save him, who is praying for him and who would be sorely hurt by such an action.

At the time of the harvest, when both wheat and tares are fully grown, and before they are ripened, is the opportunity for the separation between them; so that the tares shall not drop their seeds and the wheat shall not suffer, even though its roots are disturbed.

There is coming a time, in the end of the age, when the good and the evil will be finally separated. They shall not dwell together forever, to perpetuate unto eternity the misery and cruelty and injustice of the present dispensation. But the evil shall be rooted out and destroyed, while the good shall be saved.

Thus the kingdom of God has a future aspect as well as a present. If it is already here in the coming of its founder, it is also future in the return of Christ to judge and reign. If it is now operative as a principle, it is still unrealized as a perfect achievement.

We live in the period of the imperfect realization of the kingdom in human society. There have been hypocrites and false teachers in the church in every age from the days of the apostles until now. Wrong and shame disfigure the workings of the most Christian of modern nations. But the kingdom of God is coming still, in power.

It is certain that sometime the kingdom will appear in its perfection. In God's own time there shall descend from heaven the holy city, the new Jerusalem, pure and stainless. And into it there shall enter nothing that defileth or maketh a lie, but only they who are registered in the list of the citizens of the city of the Lamb.

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

TOPIC—"How I have proved Christianity and seen it proved." John 3:25-36; 21:24.

This is the age of the question mark. Everything must stand the test of the new times. Nothing is taken for granted. Even the most fundamental institutions, like the family, are being challenged. Peter's admonition to Christians to be ready to give to every man that asks an answer concerning the hope that is in them was never more needed than today. And the explanation of Christianity which the world most readily comprehends is that which is written in terms of character.

The one most unanswerable argument for Christianity is a Christian life.

Every little while somebody raises a breeze of discussion by indicting present-day Christianity by its own standards. A tremendous case may thus be made out. The weakness of it lies in representing Christianity as a failure; whereas, the most that can be said is that it has not come up to its own high standards. Contrasted with the condition of non-Christian lands, the state of Christendom is like paradise. And this is probably a fairer test than the other. The gospel has proved itself in the wonders it has wrought in making over the cruelty, unbrotherliness and stagnation of paganism into what even the worst cynics will admit is the best order of human life this old globe has ever known.

"Taste and see that Jehovah is good!" is the psalmist's challenge. That is fair. A merchant can make no greater inducement to a purchaser than a free trial of the goods. A common method of advertising is by the distribution of samples. The Scriptures boldly affirm that the surest way to know the goodness of God is to try him and see. Argument is only vanity; put God to the test. The answer of the centuries to this is that "They who greatly trust him find him greatly true."

The final proof of Christianity is—Christians. It makes men of those qualities of character which have come to be designated by the word "Christian." As we may fairly judge Buddhism by Buddhists, Confucianism by Confucianists and Mohammedanism by Moslems, so we may test Christianity by its Christians. That proposition opens up to us a vista of the noble men and women we have known—the holy mothers and strong fathers; the persons who have won to greatness of character and service because of their religion. The unselfish and helpful folk whom we call to mind are legion. We recall, too, that the persons among our acquaintances who have stood for the highest ideals of refinement and culture and citizenship have been Christians. We see the benevolent institutions of our time kept going by Christians. The new passion for social justice and well-being had its first prophets in the church, and today draws its principal support therefrom. So, in spite of many of us who have come far short of our Christian vision, we may fairly rest the case of Christianity on its finished product—Christians.

Society draws many horizontal lines; Jesus drew none, and only one vertical line. He knew no classes except the good and the bad, the sheep and the goats, the saved and the unsaved. This idea has been strikingly put in some verses by John Randolph Stidman:

"After all, and after all,
  Since ever the world began,
Just two have lived, and two have died
In lowly mien, in lordly pride,
  The rogue and the honest man.

"After all, and after all,
  Escape it we never can;
Only the choice of one have we,
And you must be and I must be
  A rogue or an honest man."

The "eccentric" person is the one who is out of center, he has been maladjusted to life. When Christ is the center all of life swings true and normal.

Profession and possession are not always the same; but we may know that one is possessed of Christianity when we read the peace of Christ on his face and see his hands and feet busy on Christlike errands. What says James: "What doth it profit, my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, but have not works? Can that faith save him? . . . Yea, a man will say, Thou hast faith and I have works: show me thy faith apart from thy works and I by my works will show thee my faith."

The most real personality in the experience of countless persons is not wife or mother or husband or father or close friend, but Jesus Christ, with whom the heart holds mystic, mighty intercourse. He has been more real to the prisoner than his prison bars; more real to the invalid than his sickbed; more real to the toiler than his task.

"Closer is he than breathing,
Nearer than hands or feet."

No statistics tell of this most vital factor in Christianity, the personal relationship of the individual spirit with the risen, still-living Christ. He is the supreme vindication of his gospel.

"This is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

MISSIONARY WORK

Missionaries' Love for Mr. Severance

News of the death of Louis H. Severance has come to mission workers all around the world as tidings almost unbelievable. But perhaps it is in Korea that the shock of the bereavement and loss seems most stunning. Though Mr. Severance had been so liberal to every mission country, it was to Korea that he had been most lavish. The largest single investment of his lifetime was no doubt in the Severance hospital and medical college at Seoul, and scarcely anywhere else were his ties of personal friendship as deep as with the members of the Seoul station. It was natural, therefore, that the missionaries there should meet promptly in memorial service to express their grief. Dr. H. G. Underwood and Dr. O. R. Avison were appointed a committee to draft an expression of sympathy with Mr. Severance's family and friends at home, and the resolutions which they adopted express the liveliest appreciation both of the fellowship and friendship of their benefactor and of his gifts. The resolutions say:

"We wish to express our deep feeling of gratitude and affection for the way in which Mr. Severance gave himself to us as well as to our Lord's work, both here and everywhere. He was a true friend of the cause of Christ, a true follower of Jesus, and though the monuments to his generosity here in Korea, not only in the hospital, medical college and school, but in many other forms, will continue to speak of him and carry on the good he began, he has left a more undying record in our hearts, a memory of love and faith and Christian devotion."

Supply Pastor Desired in Oriental City

In a large city of the far East a union congregation, gathered from the English-speaking colony, desires a strong minister to supply its pulpit for a period of some months. The hope of the leaders of the congregation is that some well known American pastor contemplating a trip around the world will be willing to extend his absence from America sufficiently to give this time in a parish where he will find the backing of a large and active body of Christian laymen. It goes without saying that only a man of strong preaching gifts would be acceptable in this situation.

The request of this congregation has been addressed to Secretary Robert E. Speer of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions in New York because he is the chairman of the committee appointed by the interdenominational Foreign Missions Council to consider the religious needs of Anglo-American communities on mission fields. But Mr. Speer has no one in mind to recommend, and wishes The Continent to announce his desire to correspond with any minister of any evangelical denomination who is willing to be considered in connection with this proposal.

Through Tribulation Into the Ministry

Teng Yao Jung, a student for the ministry in Yihsien Bible School, has consecrated himself to this service out of gratitude for a recent narrow escape from execution as a robber. Teng, like so many thousands of other progressive Chinese students, cut off his queue at the time of the establishment of the Chinese republic. But later on, going to his home in Kiangsu province for his summer vacation, he found himself in the midst of a locality where a conservative sentiment had frowned upon the queue-cutting feature of reform, and in consequence he was immediately under suspicion as a stranger, and therefore presumably a vagrant and robber. Being arrested and put in jail, he was condemned to suffer 100 blows as a means of making him confess to his supposed crimes. Teng realized that he would probably not survive such a beating, and was in great fear for his life. But the imprisoned student gave himself to prayer, and at the same time sent anxious word to his family in his home town. Happily, the family there had influence enough with the local officers to get their official guaranty that Teng was not a robber, and this document arrived at the prison just at the latest moment to save Teng from the ordeal that would likely have proved fatal. The friends who came to his rescue took him on home, and not even the discovery that his release had cost the remaining family patrimony hindered his profound thanksgiving for his deliverance, which was later expressed in his determination to devote his life to the ministry.

Traveling Between Two Mules

Miss Alma D. Dodds, stationed at Tengchou, in the Shantung district, China, gives a bit of vivid illustration of an itinerating trip in the country roundabout in a recent letter. She says: "I had heard so much about country travel and country experiences that I was ready for almost everything. Realization was better than anticipation, although I was not quite prepared to sleep in a tiny room opening off the mule and donkey stable. We traveled by shenza, or litter swung on big poles between two mules, which do not keep step. You get every combination of every motion imaginable —and some not before conceived—and may while away the slow hours in figuring out the combinations. The constant changes and the mule driver's frequent requests to move to one side or the other to relieve the strain on the mules' sore backs very successfully prevents much sleep. The whole of Webster's dictionary is not sufficient to describe the inns where we stop at noons. One ancient cloth does duty as handkerchief, towel, dish wiper, dishcloth and duster. Strange one's appetite is not more in evidence! And mud floors everywhere, of course, even in many wealthy homes."

Miss Dodds speaks particularly of the splendid spirit of fellowship she noted between evangelists and native Christians. She says there was an air of joyful comradeship everywhere, and she, though a stranger, was greeted like a long-known, very dear friend.

Thanks from Persian Lepers

The latest word from the Tabriz lepers, of whom Mrs. Van Hook, Miss Holliday and Mrs. Annie-Rhea Wilson have often written, comes from Mrs. Vanneman of that station through the quarterly magazine of the Mission to Lepers in India and the East, telling of her visit to the leper village recently. "They charged me to send all their salaams to the kind friends who were so interested in them, and to say that they knew they were being helped for Christ's sake and appreciated both the gifts and the prayers that accompanied them." Mrs. Vanneman and her evangelist visited every hut and conversed with almost all the inhabitants of the village.

Some Practical Preaching in Persia

From Urumia, Persia, Rev. E. T. Allen writes of evangelistic work carried later than usual into the spring because of the long delayed departure of the snow: "While the snow and cold continue men are not able to go plowing and sowing, and during the enforced period of idleness many are inclined to attend anything that savors of amusement or offers a change from the dullness of village gossip. So the singing attracts some, and the preaching attracts others, and the brogue of the foreigner is that which draws the rest. In one village the meetings were of special interest because of the attendance of some twenty-three Moslem men and a few women who understood the Syriac language used. After a sermon on sin, in which the topics of stealing and lying were prominent, one young Moslem, as he went out, was overheard to say to his fellow, 'I'll never steal again from now till doomsday.'"

"Smiley Face" Sees Victory in Prayer

At Kachek, in the island of Hainan, one of the most steadfast converts of the mission is known to the missionaries. for reasons that can be easily divined, as "Smiley Face." On a recent occasion, however, he came into the mission compound with the smile that had suggested his name quite gone. He confided to the missionaries his great distress at the serious condition to which his father had come by persistent opium smoking. The Christian son had been sadly enough outraged by his father's personal use of the drug, but when he found that the old man had begun selling opium to others, the disgrace seemed to him more than he could stand. With a charming simplicity of faith, "Smiley Face" insisted that the missionaries must immediately betake themselves with him to the only refuge which he knew—the refuge of prayer.

This was on Saturday night. On Sunday the devoted son gave himself to fasting, and refused all importunities to come to the table and eat. At last on Monday afternoon his faith was rewarded, for the father came voluntarily to the compound and made application to be admitted to the opium cure which the hospital administers. This was quite sufficient to restore the smile to the faithful Christian's face, but he went on praying for his father's complete recovery, which at the last report from the mission seemed to be well assured by the favorable progress of the treatment.

New Chapels for Tengchowfu District

The Tengchowfu station on the Shantung coast in China is one of the mission stations where the street chapel policy has been developed consistently and persistently. Besides the main Bible and reading rooms near the water front of the Tengchowfu port, the mission now maintains twelve other preaching places in outlying suburbs and adjacent market towns. The Bible and reading room reaches not only the local populace but many sailors landing from boats at the wharf. The attendance at this point reaches 10,000 or 12,000 a year, and Mr. Sen, the evangelist there, is doing excellent work. Latterly the group of Christians connected with this center have pledged a considerable sum for the upkeep of a chapel just leased and opened in the North suburb. A new Sabbath school and other services have been started likewise near the seashore in the East suburb. Rev. J. P. Irwin writes that the Tengchowfu station believes so thoroughly in this work that it is eager to open a large number of new chapels. On the average, $300 gold is sufficient to put up a building and start off a new center of this sort of work.

Missionary Brevities

—Representing the newly organized Federation of Woman's Foreign Missionary Societies, Mrs. Helen Barnett Montgomery and Mrs. H. W. Peabody will sail in November for a world journey to mission stations. Mrs. Montgomery, who is to prepare the 1915 book for the central committee for united study of missions, will continue to write for The Continent. The junior study book for 1915 has been intrusted to Mrs. Peabody.

—The day before Rev. Thomas C. Winn left Dairen, Manchuria, for America the Japanese held a service at the grave of his wife, as the new monument had just been erected. There were about seventy people present, and several made brief remarks. One of the speakers was the vice-president of the Manchuria railroad. The foundation stone and railing of the monument are of Korean granite, while the cross is of white marble from Tsingtau, China. All the money for it was collected by the Japanese from those living in Japan, Chosen and Manchuria—a fitting climax to the affection the Japanese have shown for Mr. and Mrs. Winn.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was led by Mrs. W. B. Jacobs, who spoke of "several ways of bringing our friends to Jesus." Mrs. Thomas E. D. Bradley, treasurer, reported July receipts $6,878. Rev. David S. Tappan, Jr., of China, brought news from Kachek station, Hainan, of the growth of the boys' school, and such an exchange of superstition for knowledge as seemed almost incredible. With proper accommodation for not more than forty, the number of boys enrolled last year was sixty. Dr. Lowrie gave money to put up temporary dormitories and now Mrs. Kelly writes of ten turned away for lack of room in one day. Mr. Tappan's story of the opium victims was saddening. "Poor fellows, smoking thirty or forty years, how can they quit? The saddest part is that opium so affects the will power; when the habit has been broken the man is easily tempted by any sickness or pain to form it again, and the women of his own household are the first to urge him to smoke."

NEW BOOKS

The Life Story of a Great Naturalist

THE STORY OF MY BOYHOOD AND YOUTH, by John Muir. Stevenson's characterization of a boy as being "part poet, part pirate and part pig," seems to have been proved at least partially by the boyhood of John Muir. There was an ancient inherited belligerence in his blood, which, fostered by the stormy North sea on whose shores he was born, expressed itself in a youthful pirate wildness. This wildness, however, was tempered more and more by a very tender love for all living, growing things. In that love the "poet" perhaps found expression. But of the "pig" this story of John Muir's boyhood discloses no trace.

Had there been any inherent meannesses in his makeup, beyond question his early training would have developed them, for his life in Dunbar seems to have been one savage record of beatings given and received. "To be a 'gude fechter,'" he says, "was our highest ambition, our dearest aim in life." These "fechtings" were vigorously supplemented by "warlike thrashings" both at school and at home, the latter administered with religious fervor by a father who devoutly believed in eternal punishment for bad boys, both here and hereafter. Learning was actually driven into the child by vigorous application of the rod, till at 11 he had committed to memory the whole of the French, Latin and English grammars, and knew three-fourths of the Old Testament and all of the New "by heart and by sore flesh." For his father had made "the grand, simple, all-sufficing Scotch discovery that irritating the skin excited the memory."

When John was 11 came the removal of the Muir family to the primeval Wisconsin woods. A "sudden plash into pure wilderness," he calls it, where, there being no other school, "every wild lesson was a love lesson, not whipped but charmed into us." But life continued harsh even in this paradise of birds and flowers. Little John was at the plow doing a man's work when he was 12. But in a measure to offset these hardship, there were the mysterious good things of the woods to learn and love, and the Muir children grew into a deep and understanding fellowship with the furred and feathered folk of field and forest.

When John was 15, however, he began to have a hunger for real knowledge, and in brief and stolen moments mastered higher mathematics and reviewed grammar, making time also to invent a clock and other ingenious mechanical contrivances. It was against the express wish of his father, and without any pecuniary aid, that he at length entered Wisconsin University. By teaching school in winter, working in the harvest fields in summer and doing various other things he managed to pay his way, spending four years of "hungry and happy and hopeful days," and then "leaving one university for another—the university of the wilderness."

At this point the written narrative ends. Its subsequent chapters may be read in some of the author's previous volumes. In these can be traced the influence of his youthful training and environment which, harsh though they were, left only gentle marks on the character of the man. His story of those boyhood years is absorbing, informing, fascinating, amusing. It is one of the few books which, because of its intense, overflowing humanness, must make universal appeal. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $2.

Religious Topics

THE SPIRITUAL INTERPRETATION OF NATURE, by James Y. Simpson, professor of natural science, New College, Edinburgh, is a valuable book by a well-known naturalist of Christian convictions. It is written from the standpoint of an evolutionist and is confessedly an attempt to free the hypothesis of evolution from a materialistic environment and bias. To many readers the first and last chapters will seem the most conclusive, the one dealing with the basis and limitations of knowledge and the other with a presentation of immortality as the logical conclusion of the universe. The immortality defended is, however, the immortality of the "fit," or, as it is commonly called, "conditional immortality." The discussion is learned, quotations abounding from a hundred modern authors, and while some difficult questions seem to be answered with many qualifying terms, the fact is frankly conceded that nature always needs a spiritual something behind it to account for its being what it is. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.50 net.

THOUGHTS ON THINGS ETERNAL, by John Kelman, is a book of studies in life, here and hereafter, arranged for the Sundays of the Christian year. The brief homilies are always helpful, sometimes eloquent. They are practical in the sense that they deal with our duties and hopes rather than with our doubts and our fears. Dr. Kelman is not so anxious to solve difficulties as to provide bread. No one can fail to be grateful for such a volume. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.50.

THE INTERPRETATION OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE, by John Watson. Two volumes: Part I., Historical; Part II., Constructive. These two volumes contain the Gifford lectures delivered in the University of Glasgow in 1910 and 1912. Lord Gifford prescribed in his deed of gift that the lecturers under the foundation bearing his name should confine themselves to "natural theology." The phrase is somewhat ambiguous, but it has been construed broadly enough to include the philosophical point of view and method with religion, and no series of lectures given to the public upon this magnificent foundation thus far excels Dr. Watson's as a philosophical discussion of the subject of religion. As the titles of the two volumes indicate, the first takes up the subject from the point of view of the history of thought. Beginning with a brief sketch of the foundations laid by Greek philosophy, the lecturer proceeds to trace the philosophical exploration of the realm of religious experience mainly through the history of Christianity. In the second volume Dr. Watson tests the several philosophical views at present sharing the adherence of thought leaders, and discusses the merits and defects of each. His own philosophy is distinctly idealistic and very perceptibly colored by the acceptance of the Christian religion as a personal faith. Dr. Watson's style is clear and felicitous. He has the rare quality of bringing philosophy to the level of the common mind without letting it lose its proper dignity. [Macmillan Company, New York.

RELIGION AND THE GROWING MIND, by John Douglas Adam. Assuming the dynamic view of human nature as distinguished from the static—i. e., that man's spiritual being is expansive and not a thing fixed once for all—Dr. Adam endeavors to supply a help toward its normal development. In a series of short but cogent chapters he outlines the methods of the soul's growth and then suggests practical thoughts as to the healthy promotion of the enlargement of this inner life. There is nothing in the work of the controversial or purely critical kind, and it is very well adapted to meet the need that has stimulated the author to write it. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 75 cents net.

SOCIOLOGY IN ITS PSYCHOLOGICAL ASPECTS, by Charles A. Ellwood. No other tendency in current thought and study is more truly modern than the habit among present-day scientists to carry their specialties into one another's territory. Intermediate or composite new sciences are thus being rapidly created. It is not long since the field of psychology was thus invaded by physiology, and the science of physiological psychology produced. Now psychology is subjected to invasion from the opposite direction, and this volume by Dr. Ellwood, who is professor of sociology in the University of Missouri, expounds sociological psychology on the basis of "the psychological theory of society." This psychological theory manifestly covers also a strong biological element, for "organism," "consciousness," "instinct," "habit" and like words are terms which the author uses freely. The book is distinctly technical and will doubtless have its largest use as a primary or supplemental text in advanced sociological courses. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.50.

THE OLD-TIME RELIGION, or, The Foundations of Our Faith, by David James Burrell. The author discusses religion, its three great doctrines (God, man and God-man); its authority, the Bible; its organization, the church. Like all Dr. Burrell's writing the style is vivid with much Scripture reference and poetical quotation. The point of view is, of course, fundamentally conservative, and Dr. Burrell has little use for what may be called critical results. He does, however, set out in striking form the argument in behalf of the Christian faith, and the book is sure to be of help. It is a salutary thing to remember that in these days of wavering a man can stand unwavering in 5th avenue, New York, and preach the old-time religion. Young ministers may well take that fact to heart. [American Tract Society, New York. $1 net.

THE MASTER OF REPARTEE, by Cyrus Townsend Brady, is a series of sermons from the author of popular "Wild West" stories. When it is said that Dr. Brady takes the text, "Without shedding of blood there is no remission of sins," to find in it only the basis for an essay upon "Blood and Its Uses," we indicate one point of questioning among many that are likely to arise with the reader who believes himself acquainted with the more effective forms of Christian preaching. The volume takes its title from the first sermon. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25.

THE GATES OF DAWN is a volume of thoughts for the morning by that prince of modern preachers, W. L. Watkinson. Prayers by Laughlan MacLean are added. Each text and its accompanying study are intended to afford the reader that for which the little boy sighed: "Five minutes with God." [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25.

Church and Sunday School

THE WORLD WORK OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, by David McConaughy. This is a course of mission study training for church officers and workers. It should prove suggestive for pastors in their work with missionary committees and young people's societies, as well as in all the other educational agencies of the church. Mr. McConaughy is the well-known secretary of the eastern division of the Foreign Board's home work, but his book covers home missions also. It abounds in missionary illustrations and quotations. There are questions for review and further discussion. We commend it to pastors who are looking for suitable missionary textbooks. [Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia. 50 cents net.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL BOOK EVER WRITTEN. by D. A. Hayes, tells us of the author and exhibits the contents of the gospel according to St. Luke. The title is taken from Renan who so characterized Luke's story of our Lord' mission. A very careful chapter is devoted t the evidences of authorship and the volum would make an admirable textbook for a Bibl class engaged in the study of the third gospel [Eaton and Mains, New York. 75 cents.

EFFICIENCY IN THE SUNDAY SCHOOL, b Henry Frederick Cope. Dr. Cope has ha twenty years in the ministry, of which the pas five have been devoted to his secretaryship o the Religious Education Association. His boo is sure to be helpful to pastors and Sunda school workers, to whom we commend it. It teaching is not generally new, but is sane put; it is also prophetic. The Sunday scho is increasingly counted one of the educational features of the church, but only one, the church's general program of education being much broader. The chapter on "Educational Engineers in the Church" is heartening. In large churches such men are needed. Several of Dr. Cope's proposals are "counsels of perfection," as superintendents, teachers and pastors can see; but the principle involved is beyond dispute. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

Preachers and Reformers

The Latin Works and the Correspondence of Huldreich Zwingli, edited, with introduction and notes, by Samuel Macaulay Jackson; translated by Henry Preble, Walter Lichtenstein and Lawrence A. McLouth. Volume I. This is the first of a series of volumes projected by the late Dr. Samuel M. Jackson of the University of New York, in which the works of the great reformer Zwingli are to be put before the English reader in a readable translation. Hitherto these works have been accessible only in Latin and German; and these translations will certainly be worth while, for Zwingli, like Luther, took a deep interest in all the living issues of his day and was careful to express himself in a vital and alluring style. This volume will not fail to interest the student of the reformation period. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

Nine Great Preachers, by Albert H. Currier. Dr. Currier has been for many years a student and teacher of homiletics, and it is from this standpoint that he considers these nine eminent preachers—Chrysostom, Bernard of Clairvaux, Richard Baxter, Bossuet, Bunyan, F. W. Robertson, Alexander McLaren, Henry Ward Beecher and Phillips Brooks. He gives only leading facts in the biographies, concerning himself chiefly with the men themselves, their methods and the secret of their power. It is a satisfying and fascinating study. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. $1.50 net.

Miscellaneous

Reminiscences, Sermons and Correspondence, 1884-1913, by Augusta E. Stetson, C. S. D. It would assuredly be a wearisome and uninteresting task for any other than an Eddyite to read all the 1,200 pages of this book—even skipping the "poetry." Mrs. Stetson was founder and for some years pastor of the first Christian Science church in New York City, and in spite of her excommunication is still loyal to Mrs. Eddy, though evidently persuaded that the direction of affairs at the headquarters in Boston has come under "carnal" influences. The book gives definiteness to the schism that has begun to show itself in Christian Science ranks. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $5.

How to Master the Spoken Word, by Edward Gordon Lawrence, is designed as a self-instructor for all who would excel in the art of public speaking. That the printed page can ever enable a student to become a master of speech may well be doubted, but there are many things in this book that will help him toward logical arrangement and lucid expression of thought. A large portion of the volume is given to models selected from the orators of all ages. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. $1.50 net.

The Play of Today: Studies in Play-Structure for the Student and the Theater Goer, by Elizabeth R. Hunt. Seeks to inspire a more intelligent appreciation of modern drama. [John Lane Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Work of the Bethany Girls

BY E. N. WARE

THE BETHANY GIRLS are known for their devotion to the "better part" which helps to lessen the perplexities of the "serving part." Ten years ago the Bethany Girls began in a Bible class at Winona Lake taught by Mrs. Carrie Stewart Besserer. The group of young women who gathered about this teacher, all eager to know and interpret the truth for their daily service and to translate it into growing character, began a movement which today is blessing thousands of young women. They never asked for a formal organization. In these days of multitudinous organizations it is refreshing to find help in spiritual development which does not demand an extra set of officers. "Bethany Girls" is an inspirational work among young women. Those who are helped by the movement are found in all sorts of Christian service. It knows no denominational name. It does not encourage local Bethany meetings. It does not interfere in any way with any young woman's local church duties. It rather tends to increase her efficiency along those local lines by deepening her spirituality. There are no admission fees, no annual dues. "Bethany Girls" is spirit in service rather than a method, although it does not despise method. It seeks to be felt rather than to be seen. Its enlargement in numbers has been due to a contagion of the Spirit.

Mrs. Carrie Stewart Besserer and Mrs. W. A. Peterson
[Leaders of the Bethany Girls]

There are three fundamentals upon which this movement rests and which constitute the bond of union. They are the aim, the badge, the covenant. To give each of these in substance outlines the underlying purpose and heart of the movement.

The Aim: "Every girl a spiritual center radiating the Master's purpose in her home, daily life and church."

The Badge: A witness and a testimony. It consists of an enameled white background, standing for purity of life, with a blood-red cross of Christ's atoning sacrifice inclosed within a circle, signifying eternity. The word BETHANY in gilt letters suggests the peaceful home where Jesus loved to go.

The Covenant: "Trusting in the Master for help:

"I will not have eyes for that error of another which I would long to have go unnoticed in myself.

"I will not have ears for that evil report about another which I would grieve to have another hearken to about myself.

"I will not have a tongue for that frailty of another which, if my own, I would crave to have sheltered in kindly silence. For Jesus said, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto me.'

"I will make Jesus king of my life and try to do unto others as I would have others do unto me."

The signing of this covenant is the only required formality in becoming a Bethany Girl. The only distinctive Bethany work the girls do is to obtain signers to the covenant.

A copy of the covenant and enrollment card may be obtained by writing to the secretary, Miss Lois M. Lawrance, 510 Masonic temple, Chicago, or Winona Lake, Ind., in August. After signing the covenant and enrollment card and mailing them to the secretary the "pillow text" is returned, thus regularly enrolling the new member. The pillow text reads as follows:

> "Fear thou not [new member's name], for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness.—Isaiah 40:10."

With each year the doors of larger opportunities have been opened as though by an unseen hand, until now, in the decennial year, the work is being carried on the year round throughout America and in some foreign lands. The increasing demand of the girls themselves for greater spiritual help is constantly prompting enlargement of the work. Out of the Bible class period came a demand for a "twilight hour." Then came the "problem hour," the study classes, the athletics, the musical training, the personal workers and the "even song."

During the summer Bethany Girls assemble in Bethany lodge at Winona Lake, Ind. Mrs. Besserer and Mrs. W. A. Peterson, leaders, and Miss Lawrance, secretary, establish headquarters for the homecoming of the "Bethany Girls." A program full of instruction, inspiration and recreation is conducted daily.

Mrs. Besserer was formerly a helper to S. H. Hadley in the Water Street mission in New York City. This wise and far-sighted fisher of men sent her away to fish "up stream" where the waters are clearer and the catch surer. The Bethany Girls movement is the result. It commends itself to workers who have young women under their care. It appeals to young women who desire the deepening of their spiritual lives, who sincerely choose "the better part" which Jesus commended in Mary of Bethany.

Beside the Stillwater

(The Continent's Cover Page for This Week)

Just a humble little stream not recorded on the ordinary map; one of the thousands that bear the inland waters to the mighty rivers sweeping toward the sea. No imposing castles link it with a romantic past; no mountains reflect themselves in its waters; no poet has sung its beauties. Yet not the lordly St. Lawrence, nor the historic Hudson, nor the storied Rhine, has for The Boy who dwelt by the Stillwater such a thrill as came into his heart when he saw this picture.

Long ago, before the white man pressed his way into the western wilderness, the Indian had found sweet water and fertile soil for his fields of maize in this valley that led to the Great Miami and to the Beautiful River; here his villages peacefully sheltered his women and children while the Indian wandered in the chase or on the warpath. Then came The Boy's ancestors, to wrest their way into possession of this treasure land that for a century now has freshly revealed its riches with the coming of each harvest; then The Boy himself to wade in the riffles at the bend, to conquer the depths of the "blue" swimming hole, to lure the playful sunfish and to make the river truly his own during the brief joyous summer of early youth. Then the departure and the years that have intervened; left to The Boy only such memories as these—and of the grandmother, who sank softly to sleep with the psalmist's words on her lips—"beside the still waters"; of all his family, from these great grandsires to whom the days of 1776 were as of yesterday, down to the youths of his own day—all resting on the slope of the hill that overlooks the Stillwater.

Ever more gently flow its currents; scarcely a ripple disturbs its surface; like those who once played in its riffles and pools, it seems to have wearied with age; surely it cannot respond to the instinctive demands of the boy of today as it did to The Boy of long ago!

But The Boy's thoughts, he finds, come to be less and less of the joys of old; more and more his vision is of the sweet calm of the hillside, where sleep his ancestors beside the Stillwater.

Tinkering the Lord's Prayer

"Why do Presbyterians use the words 'debts' and 'debtors' in the Lord's prayer, while some others use 'trespass' and 'trespasses'?" was a question recently asked. The answer given was, "Because it is scriptural both in the original text and in all the versions made from it." Two gospels give us the Lord's prayer. Matthew has it, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." Luke reads, "Forgive us our sins, for we also forgive everyone that is indebted to us." The words translated "debts" and "sins" may be synonyms, but the words translated debts and trespasses cannot be. The word translated "debts" has a larger meaning than the word translated "trespasses." It includes sins both of omission and commission, which the word "trespasses" does not. It meets the statement of the Westminster shorter catechism, which defines sin as "any want of conformity unto or transgression of the law of God." Literally translated the Lord's prayer reads, "Forgive us the things we ought"—ought to do, and ought to be—hence debts.

The word translated "trespasses" represents overt acts or transgressions, but does not cover that larger part of our sin—"a want of conformity unto the law of God"—that part which makes us sinners when we are not openly transgressing. But does not Christ say, "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive you your trespasses"? Yes, but Christ is speaking only of part of our "debt," the sins of man against man. The sins committed by finite sinful beings against each other can never be like the sins which they commit against an infinitely holy God, whose laws they have trespassed and whose glory they have failed to maintain. The fact that Christ did not use the word "trespasses" in the Lord's prayer and did use "debts" and also commanded us to pray "after this manner" ought to be sufficient reason for retaining that word.

How then did the word "trespass" come to be used? The answer given by one who uses this changed form was that "some of the fathers" of their denomination, fearing that the word "debts" might convey a false meaning, substituted "trespasses," yet the combined scholarship of two continents after nineteen centuries of Bible study could find no other words to convey the meaning of the original Greek better than "debts" and "debtors" and so translated the Lord's prayer with these words in all the revised versions of the New Testament.

Which should stand—the tinkering of the past or the scholarship of the present?

About Writing When One Is "Riled"

I have just read Dr. Clark's article on "The Gadflies of the Press." The reading of the article has given me a little pain and caused some irritation. The author starts out by declaring that he is "anxious for a good understanding between the old England and the New England." His ostensible purpose in writing the article was to do what he could to lessen "the animosities that make the Americans hate the English." But I fear he has woefully missed the mark he aimed at.

I fear Dr. Clark made a big mistake in writing his article while he was evidently "riled," as he asserts, in his note to the editor, any American cannot but be, "if he stays in Europe for any length of time, by what the English dailies have to say about Americans." He further says—in his note to the editor—"This has afforded me a chance to let off a little steam." When a man feels "riled," and is glad of an opportunity "to let off a little steam," he is evidently not in the proper spirit to write upon a question which above all things needs to be dealt with in fairness, and in the temper of gentleness, tolerance and with that "love which covereth a multitude of sins."

Dr. Clark's article is a bitter, uncompromising and biased tirade on Englishmen with their rude manners and intolerable assumption of superiority; while by implication the American is the very acme of good manners and faultless demeanor. With regard to the doctor's quotations from the English press, may I point out that he acknowledges it is very difficult to procure the best English papers on the continent, and then proceeds to give extracts, reflecting on the good taste of the English from such a paper as The Daily Mail. Dr. Clark should know that for any man to quote The Mail as the standard of the best English opinion and taste is to cause the best people in England to regard the writer with pity for his ignorance.

Wants Tributes to the Bible

Many years ago the writer attended service conducted by an evangelist which made a deep and abiding impression. The evangelist read selections from a little volume entitled "Homage of Eminent Persons to the Book" (the Bible), compiled by Samuel W. Bailey, New York, published in Boston in 1869.

We believe that great good would be accomplished if this book could be reproduced with additional testimonials by distinguished men of our day, not for profit but for the purpose of giving as wide publicity as possible to these testimonials for the promotion of Bible study.

If Mr. Bailey (whose address is unknown), or some person, or society, will furnish the means for republishing the little book we believe that good would result, and we will gladly supply without charge any material which comes to us.

We hope that the readers of The Continent will share in the good work by sending short testimonials written by famous Christian men, giving their estimate of the value of the Bible to themselves and to mankind. Kindly send to me at 5540 Walton avenue, Philadelphia, Pa.

Sends His Continents to Alaska

Rev. S. Hall Young, our Presbyterian longtime faithful missionary to Alaska, persuaded me and others that it was a Christian privilege and duty to send religious and other good literature to the pioneer miners, fishermen and settlers in Alaska. So last spring I mailed about a bushel of my Continents, Banners, Presbyterians and other religious weeklies to a dozen different missionaries for their lonesome, hard-working American constituents. Recently I had the earliest acknowledgment from Rev. Robert Joseph Owen, Petersburg, Alaska, as follows: "I wash to thank you for the church paper you so kindly sent me. Before this reaches you the papers will have been read to pieces by the fishermen on the boat to which I sent the packages. I have equipped ten boats with their only reading matter for this season. Nearly all the inhabitants of this little town are Norwegians and of Lutheran extraction. Word came today from the Home Mission Board directing me to remove from this point to Sitka. Moving is one of the greatest hardships of a missionary's life. A Lutheran church will be put up here and there is no need for two ministers. My wife, daughter, son and self are the only Presbyterians in town. We have a fine Sunday school. Church attendance is very good, notwithstanding that all the men are away on the fishing grounds. . . . Many of my men will be in Sitka the coming winter if Sitka gets her cold storage plant in operation, which will almost take Petersburg off the map. Alaska towns are much like many good resolutions—ephemeral."

May we not improve this great opportunity to help Christianize our great Alaskan territory by mailing our missionaries there magazines and religious papers?

New Head for Highland Park College

Dr. George P. Magill has been installed as president of Highland Park College, and with his installation the institution came officially under the control of the Presbyterian Church. Dr. W. H. W. Boyle of Lake Forest represented the church at large, Dr. C. H. Purmort represented Iowa Synod and Dr. J. W. Countermine represented Des Moines Presbytery at the installation services. The installation took place in connection with the college commencement the last week of July.

The Song of an Aged Saint

A Mother in Israel, widowed for thirty-two years and for twenty years practically confined to her room, was recently invited to become a guest for the remainder of her earthly life at one of the Homes provided by the Presbyterian Church for its disabled ministers and for the widows and orphans of deceased ministers.

Though practically blind and otherwise infirm, she cheerfully endured the strain of a 700-mile railroad journey. During the last few hours of travel, in the midst of terrific heat, she penned some simple verses, one of which follows:

"Though into the future I cannot see,
I know, dear Lord, Thou art leading me.
In ministering friends Thou dost oft appear,
So, thus, led by Thee, I have naught to fear."

Will the Presbyterian Church become more truly a "ministering friend" to the desolate widow of the Gospel minister, that (in a paraphrase of the words of the prophet Hosea) "she may sing there as in the days of her youth"?

Mr. Jessup Objects and Explains

There appeared in The New York Herald on Aug. 5 a paragraph with regard to my joining Brick church that is full of false and misleading statements from beginning to end. To those who know me the general idiocy of the article will appear on the surface. But there is just enough in it to lead to gross misunderstanding, which might naturally hurt the feelings of my friends in Fifth Avenue church, from whom I have experienced every courtesy and kindness over a long period of time. This is my only justification for troubling The Continent, as the authoritative paper in our denomination, to set the facts correctly before its readers.

When my dear personal friend, J. Ross Stevenson, removed to Baltimore, I felt so keen a sense of personal loss that I conferred at once with Dr. Richards of Brick church and arranged to remove there forthwith. Upon presenting my resignation as an elder to Fifth Avenue session, however, they appointed a committee to confer with me, and this committee persuaded me to defer my proposed action on the ground that there was a service at that juncture which I still could render to the church. Accordingly, I stayed on, and while I was engaged in an attempt to render this service Dr. Richards died.

But when Dr. Merrill came to Brick church my purpose was only strengthened, as I had a profound affection and admiration for him, but I was still engaged in part of the service I had agreed to render. When I considered that I had discharged the obligation I had assumed, I quietly requested my letter, and my wife and myself took our letters to Brick church at the summer communion service. It did not seem to be anybody's business but our own and that of the churches concerned. I received a most kindly and affectionate letter from Dr. Jowett and also from the stated clerk, Mr. Brownell, when he sent me the letters. In the few instances in which the matter was the subject of any comment at all that comment was kindly and affectionate.

On Aug. 4 I was approached by a reporter of The Herald, who pursued me even to the club, and who said that a story was going to appear in one of the religious papers in regard to my removal from Fifth Avenue church. He desired to interview me. I refused to have any words with him at all, insisting that a matter so personal in its nature could not be of the slightest interest to the readers of that paper. The next day appeared this outrageous paragraph which purported to be based upon statements made by friends of mine, piecing together absolutely unrelated facts and fancies and constituting really a libel upon me as a member of the church.

The usual fruit has ripened from this planting, and an interview appeared next morning from one of my fellow elders, who felt called upon to deny that Fifth Avenue church is not orthodox. One could almost hear the shade of Charles A. Briggs laughing across the swelling flood. The few remarks I made at Atlanta in behalf of Union Seminary are made to appear as justifying my leaving Fifth Avenue church on the ground of its ultra-orthodoxy.

I humbly submit that at all times since my first ordination as an elder in the Presbyterian Church nearly twenty-five years ago I have been orthodox, though doubtless not crowding close to Brother Fox as a defender of the faith. My only interjection of myself into any of these controversies has been in the interests of fair play and justice. You will recall I made the point of order in the Presbytery of New York when it was attempted to construe the injunction of the General Assembly so as to prevent the ordaining by presbytery of any candidate for the ministry who had studied in Union Seminary. My contention then as to the constitutional rights of the presbytery was sustained afterwards in synod and General Assembly. So at Atlanta I did what anyone with a knowledge of the opinions that had been rendered to the seminary trustees was bound to do—I protested against the treatment accorded to the directors of the seminary.

I wish to say that my family and myself have enjoyed with keen and exquisite appreciation the pulpit ministries of Dr. Jowett, and none of my ministerial friends will have the slightest feeling of objection when I say that I have esteemed him head and shoulders above his ministerial brethren in the Presbyterian pulpits of this country.

But I knew Dr. Merrill over twenty years ago, long before he went to Chicago, and had the pleasure of rooming with him at Atlanta at the General Assembly. He is a warm personal friend, and I count myself fortunate in being under his ministry. I did not leave my former church for any of the reasons assigned, nor would I for a moment make any statement in regard to my removal (which I consider of no public interest whatever) were it not for the fact that the published statement purporting to emanate from myself or friends of mine might very naturally appear to be in the nature of criticism of my associates in the church which has stood at the forefront of Presbyterianism for a century, the history of whose activities I had the honor of preparing and publishing for the church, and for the present incumbent of whose pulpit I have the very highest admiration and respect.

Ways of Working

Ideal Plan for Church Federation in Country

A few days ago in the country church and country life department of the Summer School of the South in the University of Tennessee Dr. M. B. McNutt, instructor in the department, appointed a committee of three of the class to draft articles of agreement for the federation of churches in a country parish. The committee was W. S. Harold, Jupiter, N. C.; L. D. Cory, Burnsville, N. C., and John B. Creswell, Bearden, Tenn. A hypothetical case was stated and plans outlined for a practical working federation of all churches.

"In a certain village of 200 inhabitants, and including surrounding country a total of 350, there are the following conditions: Three churches—Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist —hereafter referred to as (a), (b) and (c) respectively; (a) has a membership of thirty, Sunday school of twenty-five, services two Sundays a month; (b) has membership of sixty, Sunday school of fifty, services one Sunday in month; (c) has membership of seventy-five, Sunday school of 100 and services one Sunday a month. All have church buildings; (b) has manse and resident pastor; (a) founded nearly 100 years ago; (b) founded later; (c) founded still later. There is harmony between the churches, with unwritten agreement recognizing stated Sundays for services in each church. There is a recognized need for closer unity in service.

"With this need in mind representatives from each of the churches met and drafted the following articles of federation:

"1. We recognize the Scriptures as the rule of life, and we believe in and worship the same Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

"2. We agree to grant each and every organization in this federation the right to receive persons into their respective bodies, observe the ordinances, administer the sacraments and maintain the government according to the usage of each individual body.

"3. We agree to contribute to the current expenses of this federated body, including pastor's salary, incidentals and maintenance of property, according to the demand of the work and our individual ability.

"4. The benevolences shall be in charge of a treasurer, representing each unit of this federation, and shall direct the benevolent funds into their proper denominational channels, unless otherwise directed by the respective body which he serves.

"5. There shall be a governing board consisting of two or more persons elected annually for that purpose by each organized body and shall be equal in number from each unit.

"6. A selection of a pastor shall be by a majority of the federation membership assembled after due notice for that purpose and shall be in rotation and equal term of years among the denominations constituting this body, unless otherwise desired and unanimously agreed upon by the entire body.

"7. This federated body shall have the right to make and adopt such rules, regulations and bylaws for its own government as may seem desirable and necessary.

"8. Cases of government not covered by explicit articles of bylaws shall be decided by parliamentary law."

Larger Sums for Benevolences

Philadelphia Churches Give Increasingly to Foreign and Home Missions — City's Charities Are Many and Varied.

PHILADELPHIA—Amounts given to the benevolent causes of the church by Philadelphia churches during the last year exceed considerably those given during the previous year. Comparing those to the Boards of Home and Foreign Missions the figures are, in round numbers, as follows:

	Home	Foreign
1911-12	$78,700	$72,900
1912-13	84,700	97,700

Five years ago the amounts given were to home missions $74,700 and to foreign missions $69,700. The following churches were the largest givers to benevolence the last year, contributing in round numbers to the seven boards according to the official figures: Princeton $15,800, Second $12,400, Bethany $12,400, Germantown First $12,300, Germantown Second $11,300, Walnut Street $10,200, Arch Street $10,200, Calvary $9,600 and Tenth $9,600.

In the case of two or three churches the amounts are increased through their having in them one or two members large givers to special causes. Then, too, some sessions or church treasurers make more diligent inquiry than others for the gifts which are given individually and not through regular channels, and these, too, are credited in the church report. The church reporting the largest amount in the congregational column, $75,000, is Ninth. Bethany is Second with $30,000.

Rev. R. M. Little, formerly pastor of South Side church, Pittsburg, now general secretary of the Philadelphia Society for Organizing Charity, in the recent annual report of the society claims that "Philadelphia is a charitable community and nowhere in America has the benevolent impulse had more generous expression or so many and varied applications." During the past year there were received appeals from 8,843 families and 14,796 homeless persons. Permanent employment was secured for 366 and 37,578 meals were given, worked for at Wayfarers' Lodge. The loans and relief to families amounted to nearly $25,000. The society uses a staff of workers and volunteers, visits extensively the poor and cooperates with many other charities.

The Evening Telegraph Company, through its president, has addressed a personal letter to every minister of the city in behalf of the continuation schools and vocational education for the 15,000 boys and girls between 14 and 16 years of age who are obliged to go to work to earn a living. By a recent act of the legislature public school authorities must provide special courses for them if it is insisted upon by their friends.

The women's missionary society of Hollond Memorial church, out of regard to Dr. and Mrs. Janvier, has unanimously decided to undertake the support of a scholarship in Ewing Christian College, Allahabad, of which Dr. Janvier is president-elect. Dr. Janvier is to sail for India early in September.

Dr. M. J. Eckels, late pastor of Arch Street church, is sojourning in the Grand View Sanitarium, Wernersville, Pa.

J. Q. A. Henry, D. D., and Rev. Thomas Houston, the blind evangelist, have joined the staff of workers in the summer tent campaign. Among the pastors of the city and vicinity who have given part of their vacations to the furtherance of the work are Rev. W. R. Laird of West Chester, Rev. William McNally of Bridgeport and Rev. H. Clary Ferguson and Rev. O. G. McDowell of Philadelphia.

Among those supplying the pulpit of Fourth church in August is Rev. L. W. Warren of Galena, Ill. The supply of Chambers-Wylie for August is Rev. Henry I. Nicholas of Summit Hill.

THE "BLUES"
A Lady Finds Help from Simple Food

Civilization brings blessings and also responsibilities.

The more highly organized we become the more need there is for regularity and natural simplicity in the food we eat.

The laws of body nutrition should be carefully obeyed, and the finer, more highly developed brain and nervous system not hampered by a complicated, unwholesome dietary.

A lady of high nervous tension says:

"For fifteen years I was a sufferer from dyspepsia. I confess that an improperly regulated diet was the chief cause of my suffering. Finally, nothing that I ate seemed to agree with my stomach, and life at times did not seem worth living.

"I began to take a pessimistic view of everything and see life through dark blue glass, so to speak. My head became affected with a heavy creeping sensation and I feared paralysis.

"Palpitation of the heart caused me to fear that I might die suddenly. Two years ago, hearing Grape-Nuts so highly spoken of by some estimable friends of mine, I determined to try it.

"The change in my condition was little less than miraculous. In a short time the palpitation, bad feeling in head and body began to disappear and the improvement has continued, until at the present time I find myself in better health than I have ever enjoyed.

"My weight has increased 20 lbs. in the last year and life looks bright and sunny to me as it did when I was a child."

Church and Population Growth

Serious Problem in Detroit for Church to Keep Pace with Influx of New Residents — New Steel City to Be Dry.

DETROIT—From figures given out by the city water board it is learned that Detroit is growing at the rate of 35,000 a year and has now a population of 568,000, a gain of 103,000 in three years. To keep pace with this rapid development by starting new missions in the outlying districts the church extension committee is facing some serious problems. No one doubts that there is plenty of money for all present needs, but the question is to get it diverted churchward. The demands for new business blocks, factories and fine homes are so insistent that the church has not been able to cope with the present situation.

Five miles from the Detroit city hall, on the Canadian side of the river, the United States Steel Corporation has secured a tract of 1,650 acres on which will be located the city of Ojibway and enormous steel mills that promise to be more extensive than those at Gary, Ind. The significant thing for Detroit people is that this sturdy new neighbor is to be immune from intoxicating liquors, according to a provision in the city charter. This will help Detroit in dealing with the local liquor problem.

A life of rare devotion to an ideal was brought to a peaceful close in the death on July 14 of Alexander Ross, aged 89. For nearly fifty years he was employed by the Board of Publication, first as a colporteur and later as Sunday school missionary. Northeastern Michigan was the scene of his labors. Through the unbroken wilderness he went with his pack of books and tracts to seek out the scattered settlers. He gathered old and young into Sunday schools, many of which have grown into flourishing churches. No history of Flint or Saginaw Presbytery will be complete without an account of his pioneer labors.

Work on the new Olivet church edifice is going rapidly forward. It has a conspicuous location in the midst of a growing section of the West end. Fort Wayne church and the Woodmere mission will be merged into this new enterprise under the pastoral charge of Rev. S. D. Waterbury.

The congregation of the Gratiot Avenue church, Rev. Arie Muyskens pastor, has quite outgrown the portable house of worship, in use for the past three years, and is rejoicing in the near prospect of a new church to cost $16,000 to $20,000. The corner stone will be laid in a few days.

In response to a rumor that he might resign as pastor of Woodward Avenue church, Rev. Sherman L. Divine is quoted as saying that the matter would be held in abeyance until the middle of September.

PRESBYTERIAN TRAINING SCHOOL
of Chicago
for Christian Workers
Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery of Chicago

The demand for people who "know how to do it" is one of the conspicuous signs of the times.

Every trade and line of work is opening schools for training its workers.

It all means that we are awake to the need of people knowing how to do things and learning it in school instead of wasting time, and doing harm, experimenting on the public.

Shall we be less wise in our church affairs?

Don't you think it is time for us to undertake more seriously the training of church workers, other than ministers?

Directors of education, pastors' assistants, church secretaries, deaconesses, visitors—call them what you will or vary the duties as may be required—all should be trained in the School and come to the pastor ready for helpfulness.

That is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago. (Open this year to women only.)

If you are a prospective student, or if you want to help such a School, let us hear from you.

San Francisco Man to Chicago

Rev. W. E. Parker, Jr., Accepts Assistant Superintendency of Chicago Church Extension —Active Career in Pacific City.

SAN FRANCISCO—Rev. William E. Parker, Jr., pastor of Olivet church, surprised his congregation and local Presbyterians in general by his sudden resignation, presented Aug. 3, to take effect Oct. 1. He has accepted the assistant superintendency of the church extension work of Chicago Presbytery under E. P. Hill, D. D. Mr. Parker went from a successful practice of the law in this city into the ministry and took Olivet church when it was worshiping in a barn, and has not only housed it commodiously but built for it the only manse in the presbytery. Foremost among the leaders of working-class Christians, he has also attached a large Russian-speaking contingent to his congregation. He recently closed his moderatorship of presbytery and chairmanship of the home mission committee.

A. A. Pratt, a recent graduate of San Francisco Seminary, was licensed and ordained by presbytery before a large gathering of the Occidental Board at the monthly meeting Aug. 4, preparatory to sailing to China to enter the missionary ministry. At the same meeting Joachin Glozco of New York was received for special charge of the Russian-speaking work of Olivet church and Rev. Shingoro Satow was dismissed to San Jose Presbytery to take up work in Watsonville.

The seminary at San Anselmo is preparing for the first annual gathering of the Order of Recruits for the Ministry and Missions, an organization sponsored by Sacramento Presbytery, which was instituted at Red Bluff last year by local Presbyterian Christian Endeavorers. Five days, Aug. 18-22, will be spent in conference and study, with addresses by many prominent leaders and teachers.

"Labor Sunday" in San Francisco will be observed as a memorial day in honor of those who have gone down to death unheralded in the ranks of toil for the common good of man. This emphasis is being given the day by the labor council through the suggestion of presbytery's fraternal delegate and committee.

The committee appointed by Calvary church to find a new pastor, after President Landon had declared the pulpit vacant on Aug. 3, includes elders A. S. Johnson, D. H. Horsburg, William Romaine and Charles S. Watson.

Boys and girls of Richmond church have organized a lecture course on their own account and have undertaken to raise a considerable sum of money for the congregational expenses.

The elders of Bethany church have found that the new scheme of their pastor, combining Sunday school and church service, holds the young people so well that they are planning a layman's Sunday school survey of their whole parish.

Los Angeles Opens Seaside Home

Catholic, Jew and Protestant Join in First Program — New Church Building at Van Nuys Is Dedicated.

LOS ANGELES—The unusual spectacle of a Roman Catholic bishop, a Jewish rabbi and a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church taking part in the same program was witnessed recently at the formal opening of the Pacific Seaside Home of the Associated Charities of Los Angeles. The object of this charity is to provide outings for wage-earning mothers and their children. The building was at one time used as a clubhouse by a local gun club.

The experiment of holding interdenominational union services during the summer months is being tried at Whittier. The services are held in the auditorium of the Friends' College and are participated in by all the Protestant denominations of the city.

The congregation of St. Paul church formally opened the new church building with services morning, afternoon and evening on Aug. 3. Rev. W. G. Mills, who recently took charge of this work, finds a commodious house of worship completed in almpst record-breaking time. More than $2,000 was subscribed on the day of the opening of the building.

Robert Johnston, D. D., of Montreal supplied the pulpit of Immanuel church two Sundays in August and preached in Wiltshire and also in St. Paul churches. Dr. Johnston gave his lecture, "Men of Mettle from the Land of Heather," in Immanuel church.

The new building of First church of Van Nuys was dedicated Sunday afternoon, Aug. 3. Rev. H. H. Fisher of Third church, moderator of Los Angeles Presbytery, presided; Rev. David S. Sharpe of Bethesda church preached the sermon and William S. Young, D. D., offered the prayer of consecration. The building cost, exclusive of the lot, $10,400, all of which has been fully provided for. The building is colonial in design, of white glazed pressed brick. In addition to an auditorium seating about 350, there are Sunday school rooms, ladies' parlor, kitchen and pastor's study. Rev. Robert B. McCain is minister in charge.

The Roman Catholic churches of Los Angeles celebrated the 145th anniversary of the founding of the city on Aug. 3. Spanish padres passed this way Aug. 2, 1768, and stopped at the site of the city to celebrate the feast of Our Lady of the Angels of Portiuncula. Los Angeles river was first called River Portiuncula.

Church to Show Moving Pictures

St. Louis Congregation Fences In Lot in Front of Its Chapel for Paid Exhibitions—German Reformed Society Dissolves.

ST. LOUIS—North church, with a large lot in front of its stone chapel and needing funds for the building of the main auditorium, has inclosed the lot with a high fence and will conduct a moving-picture show in the open air to raise part of the money needed. The pictures are to be educational, though "comics" will not be barred. On Sunday evenings the pictures will be free to all, the pastor, Rev. W. D. Vater, delivering a sermon with the use of religious films.

Rev. Wayne H. Bowers is supplying the pulpit of West church during the summer, which is incidental to the passing of Maple Avenue German Reformed church, of which Mr. Bowers has been pastor for some months. The congregation was English, like many of the Reformed churches, and was organized as a mission in 1897 by the Illinois Classis, Rev. John C. Hornung being the first pastor. The dissolution of the church is due to the westward migration of many of the leading churches of other denominations. A large proportion of the members of the church are now attending West Presbyterian church.

The service at First church Sunday evening, Aug. 3, was well attended and unique. The uniqueness was largely due to the preacher, John F. Hendy, D. D., of the state capital, who occupied the pulpit. Dr. Hendy, who lives in retirement at Jefferson City, is a pulpit orator of the old school. He is more than six feet tall, was born in Ireland and reared in Kentucky. For years he was president of Emporia College and has been an extensive traveler. He has been a great student of the subject of architecture and also a careful investigator of criminology.

S. J. Niccolls, D. D., has just returned to this country from the Reformed Church Alliance in Edinburgh. He did not come to St. Louis, but proceeded at once to his mountain home at Old Forge, in the Adirondacks, where Mrs. Niccolls and his daughter and friends welcomed him.

H. Magill, D. D., who has been stated clerk of presbytery more than twenty years, and Mrs. Magill are spending part of August in Pennsylvania. On Aug. 3 Dr. Magill preached in the church of which he was pastor thirty years ago.

When Rev. Paul Elliott of Chicago took charge of University Park church in East St. Louis less than three months ago he began a canvass of the community and found sixteen persons having letters from other churches, who were taken into University Park church July 27.

Union and Open Air Meetings

Distinguishing Features of Church Life in New York City and Vicinity this Summer—1,700 at Vacation Bible Schools.

NEW YORK—The two distinguishing features of church life in this city and vicinity during the present season are union services and open air meetings—in many instances union services in the open air. New York City literally turns itself outdoors in midsummer, and religious workers are meeting the conditions in a practical and successful way. In addition to the almost innumerable open air evangelistic meetings conducted by several organizations, the churches and young people's societies are holding services of their own on church steps, in church yards or on the roofs of parish houses. The latest united effort began last Sunday evening with a meeting in front of Harlem church. Seven churches of the neighborhood—Methodist, Baptist, Reformed, Congregational, Pilgrim Presbyterian, Church of the Puritans and Harlem Presbyterian—are to hold open air union meetings for five Sundays. The chairman of the local committee is Edward D. Butler of the Church of the Puritans.

A remarkable series of open air meetings is being held on the lawn of "old" First church of Orange, N. J., under the direction of Rev. E. D. McDougall, who is preaching at that church during August in the absence of the pastor, Dr. Charles Townsend. Dr. McDougall is a native of Wisconsin and a graduate of Southwestern University, where he studied theology under the late Dr. Joseph R. Wilson, father of President Woodrow Wilson. He has held pastorates in Georgia and Alabama, and is now president of Alabama Presbyterian College at Anniston. "Old" First is one of the conservative churches, and this is its first experiment in outdoor evangelistic work.

In Huntington, L. I., Rev. Samuel H. Seem of Central Presbyterian and Rev. Myron D. Fuller of First Baptist church have united in tent meetings on Sunday nights during July and August. The tent is located on Main street, near the intersection of two principal avenues. The congregations have averaged from 200 to 250 inside the tent, with another hundred listeners outside. At least one-fourth of the attendants are persons rarely seen inside a church.

VACATION BIBLE SCHOOLS CLOSING

"Commencement day" for the daily vacation Bible schools conducted by the Board of Home Missions is to be observed Friday, Aug. 15, in Northminster church. There have been nineteen schools in the metropolitan district, including New York City, Brooklyn, Staten island and Newark. The average attendance has been over 1,700 daily out of a total enrollment of about 4,000. Thirty-six nationalities have been represented.

A decided change in location is to be made by the Welsh Presbyterian congregation whose church has for many years been at 225 East 13th street. A lot has been purchased far uptown, on West 155th street, in the same block with Old North church.

Mrs. Finley J. Shepard, formerly Miss Helen Gould, while staying in the Catskills is playing "absentee hostess" in her Tarrytown home, entertaining companies of children from New York. A few days ago nearly 500 mothers and children, gathered together by the Volunteers of America, spent a day on the Gould estate. The children romped on the lawns, paddled in the ponds, played games and enjoyed a pie-eating contest. Several of the mothers are wives of men now serving time in Sing Sing and are in special care of Mrs. Ballington Booth.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman in addition to preaching regularly twice each Sabbath this summer in Madison Avenue Baptist church holds an evangelistic after-service following the evening sermon. The attendance at this meeting is large and there are conversions practically every week. At communion in this congregation all who will are invited to partake without distinction as to denomination.

Paul D. Moody, a son of Dwight L. Moody, preached the first Sunday of the month in Madison Avenue church.

WORK AT WASHINGTON HEIGHTS

For the newly organized Presbyterian congregation on Washington Heights at Wadsworth avenue and 174th street a pastor has been chosen in the person of Dr. Daniel H. Martin, pastor for five years of the church at Glens Falls, N. Y. Going to this work in May of 1908, Dr. Martin found a strong and vigorous membership of 600, which under his ministry has increased to over a thousand, making it the largest church in Troy Presbytery. Previous to this Dr. Martin was a member of the Reformed Church in America and had charge of the large Clinton Avenue parish in Newark. In New York he will have the advantage of perhaps the most complete and best adapted church plant in the whole city. The building is being erected at a cost of $300,000 from a fund set aside by West-Park church out of the proceeds of the sale of the old West church property on 42d street. The most commodious possible provision for institutional work has been attended to in the making of the plans. Dr. Martin, who has been traveling abroad this summer, sent home to Glens Falls his letter of resignation from Paris, France.

1,300 in Vacation Bible Schools

Milwaukee Reports Growing Interest and Increased Attendance—Music, Hand Work and Scripture Are Taught.

MILWAUKEE—The daily vacation Bible schools have grown in interest until the total enrollment is 1,300, Perseverance church leading with 325. Children that otherwise would never obtain Bible teaching have been reached by the scores. Paul E. Hinkamp, the Milwaukee superintendent, has been giving a lecture on "The Life of Christ," beautifully illustrated, in the schools. He has also given it in a number of the churches. Sessions of the schools are held in the morning so the afternoons can be devoted to recreation. One picnic for all the schols has been held and the teachers from the various schools spent one afternoon in relaxation at Lake Park. Miss Florence Bullock, general director, spoke before the Y. W. C. A. Sunday afternoon, Aug. 3, on the work of the schools. Faith mission church school, Rev. Oliver C. Chapin pastor, held a commencement on the evening of Aug. 1, in which the children gave exhibition of their proficiency in music, the Bible and such hand work as is taught. Rev. Robert S. Donaldson, pastor of Perseverance church, is the man to whose initiative and energy the success of the schools is largely due.

Dr. James Oastler, pastor of Calvary church, is spending his vacation at Tomahawk, in the lake region of northern Wisconsin. Rev. Walter O. Wallace, pastor of Bethany church, is with his family in a cottage at East Troy, Wis.

Heretofore during August the only service at Westminster church has been the Sunday morning worship. But this year the attendance during July was so good that the officers decided to continue the Sabbath school, the evening service and the prayer meeting through the summer. This is a noteworthy reaction from the general tendency to diminish the service of the sanctuary during the vacation period. Dr. Everett A. Cutler, the pastor, is with his family in a cottage on the shore of Lake Michigan at Oostburg. The supplies for his pulpit are Rev. D. Evans Jones of Venedocia, Ohio; Rev. George B. Laird of Beaver Falls, Pa.; Jerome R. McGlade, D. D., of Princeton, Ill., and Rev. Edwin W. Childs of Milwaukee.

Dr. Paul B. Jenkins, pastor of Immanuel church, with Mrs. Jenkins and his son, the latter part of July motored to Sawyer county, in the northern part of Wisconsin, where he is spending his vacation. In his itinerary Dr. Jenkins will include visits to the beautiful spots to be found in the state. During his absence his pulpit has the following supplies: Rev. E. T. Swiggert, Cincinnati, moderator of Ohio Synod; Rev. George B. Laird, Beaver Falls, Pa.; Rev. O. M. Caward, Chicago; J. W. Cochran, D. D., secretary of the Board of Education; George L. Robinson, D. D., McCormick Seminary, and President Silas Evans, Ripon College.

E. A. C.

Dr. James M. Gray, dean of Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, is supplying the pulpit of Christ church, London, while its pastor, Dr. Len G. Broughton, is in America. He is also to be one of the preachers at the Llandrindod Wells convention, Wales.

When on June 1 Ward-Belmont, Nashville, Tenn., became an educational entity a notable nuptial had taken place in high life between two famous southern schools for girls and young women. Ward Seminary had been in existence since the civil war. A typical so-called "finishing school" in earlier years, it was steadily developed by its founder, Dr. William E. Ward, and his successors until under the administration of President J. D. Blanton it had come to first rank as a training and college preparatory school for girls. Thousands of southern women, many of them now the mothers and grandmothers of present-day students in the same institution, were educated at Ward Seminary. Belmont College was founded in 1890 by two Pennsylvania gentlewomen, Miss Ida E. Hood and Miss Susan L. Heron, who continued in the ownership till June of the present year, when both schools were acquired by a strong corporation and merged and perpetuated as Ward-Belmont. Dr. Ira Landrith, who was eight years president of Belmont and who held the same position in Ward Seminary 1912-13, is president of Ward-Belmont, Dr. Blanton being associated with him as vice-president and chairman of the faculty. The site of the united school is the former campus of Belmont, to whose buildings and equipment additions costing more than $150,000 are being made this summer and will be ready for the opening Sept. 25. These improvements include a great administration-academic building and a residence hall, the former providing ample recitation rooms, art gallery, gymnasium and swimming pool, besides the offices of the administration, and the latter including seventy bedrooms, each adjoining a bath.

Parker in Place of Dr. Safford

Nearly One-Third of Chicago Churches Under the Church Extension Board—Picnic for Mothers—Services on the Corner.

CHICAGO—News that Dr. E. P. Hill had found a successor for Dr. George E. Safford as assistant superintendent of the Church Extension Board was received with pleasure in Chicago. Rev. W. E. Parker, Jr., of San Francisco will, it was announced there, take this work Oct. 1. Dr. Safford has been intimately associated with the widening activities of this organization of presbytery and his departure to Minnesota is keenly felt. The board last year had under its jurisdiction thirty-two missions and mission churches, nearly one-third of the Presbyterian churches in this city. At these centers seventy-one workers were employed last year and the total receipts were over $64,000. It is to assist in managing this work that Mr. Parker will come to Chicago. Dr. Hill, who has been taking his vacation on the Pacific coast, is expected home soon.

Mothers and children who live in congested quarters south of the loop district were taken to Jackson park for an outing last Wednesday by the workers at Popular hall, maintained by the Christian Industrial League. A large party spent the day at the park.

Many of the sixty-five men and women who will receive their diplomas from the Moody Institute this evening will go to foreign mission fields for service. This is one of the largest classes that have graduated recently from this institution.

Rev. Paul H. McClenahan, pastor of Englewood U. P. church, has been elected associate secretary of the U. P. Foreign Mission Board. He will reside in Philadelphia.

FIRE AT ROSELAND CHURCH

Roseland church suffered a $5,000 loss by fire last week. The organ and the furnishings were destroyed. Rev. Robert O. Thomas, the pastor, is in Europe on a six weeks' vacation.

An unusually large number of visiting ministers attended the August meeting of presbytery, among them being A. D. Light, Vincennes, Ind.; D. E. Long, Menominee, Mich.; George S. Sutton, Tahlequah, Okla.; M. H. Mahaffy, Adel, Iowa; G. B. Laird, Beaver Falls, Pa.; Dr. E. A. Bess, student pastor of the University of Iowa, and Alexander Alison, D. D., Cold Spring, N. Y. Dr. Alison is visiting his son, Dr. Alexander Alison, Jr., of Hyde Park church, whose pulpit he will occupy next Sunday. He will later supply Woodlawn and Evanston Second churches. Dr. Alison was received by Chicago Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry in 1877. At that time he was a member of Jefferson Park church, of which Dr. Francis L. Patton was minister.

Rev. C. P. Bridewell of Arkadelphia, Ark., has accepted the call of Fifty-Second Avenue church and expects to begin his work about Sept. 1.

Rev. William Rice has been officially received from Detroit Presbytery and will continue to act as stated supply of Homewood church. A new $10,000 building is in prospect for Homewood, work to begin in the early fall.

Willard H. Robinson, D. D., pastor of Englewood church, is at home for the month of August and is preaching in Pilgrim Congregational church for the union services of the two congregations. This is a continuation of the arrangement which was in effect during July, when Rev. A. J. Francis of Pilgrim church preached in Englewood church.

OUTDOOR SERVICES AT JEFFERSON PARK

Jefferson Park church is conducting successful outdoor Sunday evening services on its church lawn. The stereopticon is used. The preachers for July were Evangelist Elliott, Dr. J. J. Roe and Alexander King.

Eleventh church voted in June to dispense with the evening service during July and August, but the pastor, Rev. William J. Ohan, and his session demurred. With a few faithful ones they decided to hold a brief service on the corner lot of the church. Ever since the first Sunday, June 29, there has been an averager of 250 persons present. Jews have come and listened to the preaching who would never come into the church building. Scores driving in automobiles stop, listen and speed along. The stereopticon has been employed. Mr. Ohan uses his own slides.

School and College

Occidental College has added a course of special lectures to its curriculum. The subject is social ethics and the lecturer is Professor George F. Kengott, Ph. D. The course will be elective and will be open to all undergraduates who have had one year in economics.

Rev. George H. Atkinson, who has been doing a progressive work for mountain girls of the South through the Normal and Industrial Institute at Albemarle, N. C., is enlarging his curriculum on the side of lectures and instruction in agricultural and rural problems. The institute already teaches sewing and cooking, but Mr. Atkinson finds it needful to instruct the girl students in modern ideas of farming. He doesn't exactly expect his graduates to carry on farming themselves, but he calculates that four-fifths of them will become wives of farmers, and he believes that they can better help their husbands to prosperity if they have a clear grasp of modern scientific agricultural ideas. And the new work, which will be added to the Albemarle course this winter, will be thorough enough to accomplish this effect. Mr. Atkinson also purposes to organize his graduates and ex-students into township and county teams through their home communities.

Theater for Summer Services

Wilkinsburg Men Rent Playhouse for Sunday Evening Sermons During Vacation Season—Vacant Lots as Social Centers.

PITTSBURG—During the summer season and while many of the churches have no evening service a few Christian men of Wilkinsburg have furnished the money to rent Rowland theater for evening services. The different in-town pastors are invited to preach.

Sir William Ramsay, who is conducting a seminar in Grove City College and who was one of the lecturers at Grove City Bible School, preached in Third church Aug. 3. Two exceptionally large audiences greeted the noted scholar and scientist. By request he spoke on "Paul's Travels" in the evening.

Among the noted men who will preach in Pittsburg pulpits during the next few weeks are Dr. George L. Robinson of McCormick Theological Seminary, Dr. William Evans of Moody Bible Institute, Dr. J. R. Patterson of Belfast, Ireland; Dr. Henry W. Frost of the China Inland mission and Rev. Richard Flinn of Atlanta, Ga.

Much interest centers in the prosecutions entered by the district attorney of Washington county against certain liquor dealers of Allegheny county who have been disregarding the law and shipping consignments of liquor into Washington county. Already three arrests have been made. The district attorney maintains that the laws of the state are being violated by such proceedings. The cases will be bitterly fought and will furnish a precedent.

The Y. M. C. A. of this city has adopted a novel plan to locate boys who have ability and would make good if they had the opportunity and a little encouragement. The plan has been to secure a vacant lot in some needy or neglected section, put a man in charge of it and make it the social center of the community, to which boys of all ages are attracted, thus affording the men in charge an opportunity to study them at close range. Sixteen secretaries at thirteen stations are engaged in this work.

Friday, Aug. 8, was observed as Presbyterian Day by the Presbyterians of Cambria county. A large crowd gathered at Sunset park, near Barnsboro. Among the speakers were C. C. Hays, D. D., of Johnstown and Rev. H. S. Shaw of Butler Presbytery. P. W. SNYDER.

Ministerial Obituary

Rev. Matthew F. Howie

Rev. Matthew F. Howie died at Austin (Chicago) July 25 in the seventy-third year of his age. Mr. Howie began his ministry at Malden, Ill., where he supplied for two years the Congregational church. He was pastor of the Presbyterian church of Atchison, Kan., for five years. After supplying the church in Belvidere, Ill., and some churches in Colorado for five years he became pastor again of the Atchison church, where he remained ten years. He lived for a time in Minnesota, and for five years was a resident of Austin. During

Discovering the Young Woman's Possibilities

The girl who has the opportunity in school for the development of all of her abilities will get much more from life than the one who is made to follow a rigid course that takes no account of her individuality. At Ward-Belmont there is opportunity for the student to follow her bent, although serious attention to the subjects selected is required at all times. This throws a heavy responsibility on the faculty and teachers, who must study carefully the capability and need of each student. Classes are so arranged that those with the greatest aptitude need not be retarded by others, and the large number of resident instructors makes possible individual attention.

There are twenty instructors in the academic department alone—graduates and postgraduates of the largest colleges and universities in the country. The faculty of the school of music includes seventeen teachers of piano, voice, pipe organ, violin and other stringed instruments, all trained by well known artists in Europe and America.

The schools of expression, of art, of domestic science and of physical training not only provide ample instruction in all subjects usually included in such departments, but offer normal instruction as well, so that young women who will not pursue studies further may learn to teach the subject which most appeals to them.

The year opens Sept. 25; rooms reserved in order of application. Twenty-acre estate at edge of Nashville gives exceptionally healthful location; two new buildings; splendid equipment; unexcelled opportunities for outdoor exercises, rowing, swimming, horseback riding; new gymnasium; delightful company of students from thirty states. Our registrar will be pleased to send you catalogue and illustrated booklet. IRA LANDRITH, D. D., LL. D., President. J. D. BLANTON, LL. D., Vice-President.

the greater part of his life he struggled with physical weakness and for fifteen years was able to do but little preaching. A devoted servant of Christ, gentle and patient in affliction, he rests from his labors. Interment was at Argyle. D. C. M.

Rev. M. S. Riddle

Rev. M. S. Riddle, pastor of the church at Redding, Shasta county, Cal., died July 18 at Oakland hospital, aged 70 years. Mr. Riddle, accompanied by his wife, left Redding the first of last month for a vacation, but was taken ill and died after he had been placed in the hospital. Interment was at Elko, Nev., beside the grave of a son. Mr. Riddle had been pastor of Redding church about a year.

Honor Cleveland Veteran's Memory

Although not wholly unexpected, the departure of Dr. Hiram Collins Haydn of Cleveland, noted in The Continent last week, brought from many hearts the exclamation of pained surprise, "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" A born leader, he was always in the front ranks of those advancing the interests of the kingdom of God. To the Congregational church of Painesville were given five years of such intense leadership that its present pastor the Sabbath after Dr. Haydn's death conducted a memorial service, in which the five years of almost half a century ago were reviewed and pronounced one of the most marked periods in the history of that congregation.

While it would have been natural to have the funeral rites in Old Stone church where Dr. Haydn's life had been so potent, still it was almost as fitting that the services were conducted in the Florence Harkness Memorial chapel of the Western Reserve Woman's College, since the stately buildings are monuments to his faith and tireless energy. At these services Dr. Andrew B. Meldrum, pastor of Old Stone church, and President Thwing officiated. Mentally Dr. Haydn never reached the "dead line," his four score years finding him more eager than ever to search God's word and to weigh the results of human research for new light, and without going to theological extremes he rejoiced that modern Christian scholarship had made for him a new Bible, inspiring his heart to greater love for Christ and the kingdom. One of his last public appearances was the occasion of the silver jubilee at the June commencement of the college for women, when he beheld wonderful fruitage of the seed sown in the stormy days of his brief but important presidency. Few ministers have been to any presbytery such a force as this servant of God was to Cleveland Presbytery for a period of forty-one years.

Thus the ecclesiastical fellowship mourns at the same time the loss of a most consecrated layman, Elder Louis H. Severance, and a valiant ministerial leader, Dr. Haydn. Together they planned and executed much for the kingdom of God on earth, and together they rejoice in the kingdom of glory above. * * *

First church of Belle Center is undergoing extensive repairs. About $5,000 is being expended for heating, lighting, frescoing, a new pipe organ and thorough repairs to the parsonage. In addition to these repairs the congregation will distribute $5,000 among the various church boards this fall. These improvements are made possible through a generous bequest left to the church. Every department of the church is active, especially the Bible school and young people's society. The pastor is Rev. Charles F. Irwin.

Illinois

Rev. W. G. Oglevee, pastor of South Park church, Rock Island, who for several weeks has been incapacited by rheumatism, has recovered.

With an offer in the weekly calendar to supply manuscripts of any sermon preached for "shut-ins" or deaf persons, Dr. H. P. Dunlop at Aledo church found a hearty response and deep appreciation of the opportunity to thus keep in touch with the spirit of the church. He also finds local papers are glad to publish a sermon and thus extend the influence of the gospel.

Rev. Norbury W. Thornton has been elected and has accepted the principalship of Geneseo Collegiate Institute. Thus after several years' other service Mr. Thornton returns to the same post he occupied for some twenty years.

The congregation of Perryton church have decided to remodel and add to their church, and already have over $2,000 in hand for the work. Rev. J. Thompson Baker is the pastor. This church building was erected in 1871.

The last Sabbath in July C. E. Fisk, D. D., preached his farewell sermon at Viola, finishing a most fruitful pastorate of more than eight years. Dr. Fisk succeeded his father as pastor there. He has taken up the pastorate at Grand Ridge.

Iowa

Rev. Frank Throw of West End church, Ottumwa, will take charge of the athletic work at Bellevue College this fall.

Although a majority of both churches favored a union, the required three-fourths vote was not possible, hence the Presbyterian and Methodist churches of Emerson will not consolidate.

The new Chicago chapel in the factory suburb of Fairfield is the old C. B. and Q. depot, which has had partitions removed, pews put it and such a material regeneration that it looks like a church rather than a depot. It will seat 150. The baggage room now has little children to fill it. The enterprise has been accomplished by some of the local business men, assisted by Rev. L. F. Koenig. The session of First church holds an unlimited lease to the building and grounds.

Washington

The congregation at Everson under the leadership of Rev. John Reid, Jr., has outgrown the old quarters and a new structure which will cost $5,000 is being erected.

The old church at Montesano was destroyed by fire some months ago, but the congregation has a vision of a new $10,000 church and subscriptions are being received for that purpose.

Rev. E. E. Brumley, for five years pastor at Sitka, Alaska, has accepted an invitation to serve the Cosmopolis and Westport congregations. The coming of Mr. Brumley fills every pulpit in the Presbytery of Olympia. The same will be true in the Presbytery of Columbia River.

The Sunday school at Davenport has introduced a new officer to be known as apprentice superintendent to be trained for future leadership of the school. Dr. F. B. Teter, who has recently been superintendent, has been highly successful although blind. He is a physician with a large practice. Rev. Frederick Tonge is pastor.

Idaho

The church at Aberdeen is building an eight-room manse.

Rev. O. Jones Roberts, who recently took charge of the work at Buhl, has been honored with the degree of D. D. by his alma mater, the University of Wales.

Parma church, Rev. Bruce J. Giffen pastor, has just completed a very neat and convenient manse. It is equipped with steam heating plant and other modern conveniences.

The pastor of First church, Pocatello, is Rev. Clyde E. Van der Maaten. During the nine months there he has doubled the membership of the church. The debt has practically been met. Mr. Van der Maaten was appointed by the Board of Education student pastor for Idaho State Academy some few months ago. He is moderator of Kendall Presbytery and chairman of Sunday school work for synod. A twenty-page paper is published monthly by the pastor and church.

Presbyterian and Congregational churches are getting together in various parts of the state. A meeting was recently held in Mitchell attended by Rev. William Wallace, Sioux Falls, and Rev. Edward Van Ruschen of Plankinton, representing the Presbyterians, with two representative Congregationalists from Huron and Yankton. A tentative agreement is reported

Financial Situation

Funds Readily Obtainable Where Borrower's Credit Is Unimpeached, as the Northwestern Railway Proves—Crop News.

The fact that there is plenty of money in this country ready to be turned into investment channels where there is no question as to the safety and soundness of the security was again shown last week when $4,000,000 equipment trust certificates of the Chicago and Northwestern railway were sold within a few hours. These notes bear only 4½ per cent interest, which is considered comparatively low at the present time, but the Northwestern railroad company for many years has enjoyed the highest credit because of the excellence of the management and the volume of its revenue.

As to "Moving the Crops"

In thousands of small towns over the whole agricultural district of this country farmers are beginning to drive to local elevators or mills to dispose of their grain. In many towns in the center of the wheat belt the amount of grain brought to market in a week or less would take all the cash the town has, and succeeding farmers would be unable to obtain money for their crop. It is from such a situation that there arises the need for money to "move the crop" each fall. The large elevator interests arrange with banks for credit to a certain amount and with this pay for the grain brought to the small towns. On the accumulated cereals more money is borrowed, or the grain is sold to mills and more grain bought. The farmer can then pay the grocer and interest on his mortgage, or invest in more and better stock or machinery for the farm.

In the aggregate an immense amount of capital is needed over the country, and if it is not available when the grain comes to market and the banks in financial centers have restricted the loans by raising the interest, business stagnates. The recent offer of Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo to deposit $50,000,000 to $150,000,000 in larger western and southern centers to relieve any possible stringency at this season, as told by The Continent last week, is thus seen to be a wise provision against a possible snag in business. With the new tariff bill in sight of adoption this fall and the new currency measure in the throes of making in Congress, there are enough disturbing elements abroad to render the crop moving operation of a nature which might easily become delicate.

Good Prospects for Wheat and Oats

That the crop will be a large one is indicated by the report compiled by one of the largest banks of the country, the Continental and Commercial National of Chicago, which says in part:

"Wheat, the world's greatest need, has not only been a good crop but an exceptional one. The aggregate yield of 739,000,000 bushels tops last year's record of 730,000,000 bushels, and with 30,000,000 more bushels in store in elevators, mills and on farms at the beginning of the crop season there is available a larger supply per capita than at any time in recent years. There is over and above the domestic need 170,000,000 bushels, and for the second consecutive year the United States becomes a heavy exporter of wheat.

"The second of the crops that figure in the domestic use is that of oats. Last year this crop reached the unprecedented figure of 1,415,000,000 bushels. This year conditions were unfavorable to the fullest possible yield, so that the total crop does not exceed 1,000,000,000 bushels. Only twice before did the crop pass the 1,000,000,000 bushel mark, so that the yield is above the average.

Heat Hurts Corn Crop

"This year's corn crop will not be a record one because of the burning temperatures which swept through the Southwest and Ohio valley." B. W. Snow of Chicago, a well-known crop expert, is also pessimistic in his prophecies of the year's corn harvest.

"The great rival of corn in weight and value is hay, and to a large extent it can take the place of corn when there is a shortage of that grain," says the bank's report. "The hay crop has been above the average. There have been some losses in the yield in the dry area, but in the main the crop is the second largest on record, with a total of 66,610,000 tons, as against last year's yield of 72,691,000 tons."

With Summer Schools, East and West

Ministers and Workers at Auburn

The Auburn, N. Y., summer schools closed what is considered a most successful season on Aug. 2. The School of Theology had a registration of forty-three, all but three being ministers, and the School for Christian Workers had fifty-three registered students. In addition to the ten regular members of the seminary faculty there were Rev. Warren H. Wilson of the country life department of the Board of Home Missions; George Cross, D. D., of the Baptist Theological Seminary, Rochester; Rev. Washington Gladden of Columbus, Ohio; William T. Elsing, D. D., of New York City; Rev. A. H. McKinney, superintendent of New York City mission; Rev. Edward P. St. John, Hartford, Conn.; Rev. E. Morris Fergusson, educational secretary of the Board of Publication; David McConaughy, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, Rev. Joseph Clark, superintendent of New York state Sunday schools, and teaching specialists—Miss Marie Belle Coles of Normal College, New York; Mrs. George Geyer of Xenia, Ohio, and Mrs. Herbert L. Hill of New York.

Emphasis was placed upon the educational function of the schools, and therefore everybody was there for work and worked hard. In addition to many other social and recreational features the Business Men's Association of Auburn gave the school an automobile ride one afternoon. The seminary campus and buildings afforded the material basis for work and physical comfort. These four weeks were a time for mental, social and spiritual refreshment for the hundred students. The schools are designed to furnish under ideal conditions an opportunity to ministers and leaders in church work for getting the best and latest things in Christian thought and method of religious work.

Ex-Congressman Bennet at Silver Bay

The conference of the Missionary Education Movement at Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y., from July 11 to 20 was a revelation to me. As I took the liberty of saying in a few words on the closing night, it was the first time that I had had the pleasure of actually living in a Christian community for ten consecutive days. I am convinced that the way to go to one of these conferences is to go as an ordinary registered delegate, taking the same courses which are being taken by others with similar interests to your own. The courses are so many and of such diversity of interest that there must be something which will appeal to each delegate.

It is a great thing that the principal Protestant bodies have united in uniform missionary campaigns, but the fact that they have will mean new faces among those in attendance hereafter at Silver Bay. If the coming campaigns prove a success, they will, of course, be followed by others, and for leadership in these campaigns there is practically no place to go but to the Missionary Education Movement and its conferences. Consequently in future years more pastors, board members and older laymen will be seen at Silver Bay. The younger people will continue to go, too, and in increasing numbers, because, imbued with the spirit of the age which demands efficiency, they will go more and more for the purpose of learning it. For these young people Silver Bay is especially valuable through its atmosphere of Christian fellowship. The young men and young women go back to their particular churches with a far wider vision.

The crowning feature to me was the presence of the returned missionaries, and I hope as the years go by that these will come in ever increasing numbers. Their addresses were good and effective, but their presence was even more.

Silver Bay not only teaches efficiency but inculcates it by example. The place is well run. The recreations are carefully planned and well ordered and the two pageants, one the "Arrival and Inspection of Immigrants," and the other typical Chinese scenes, were well arranged, interesting and instructive.

I would advise readers of The Continent who live within reaching distance of Silver Bay to plan now to attend the conference next July. There were about 530 in attendance this year, but if the spirit displayed is any criterion and the many enthusiastic statements of intention to come again are any guide the attendance in 1914 will be far larger. To one who desires to catch the best spirit of an onward moving church and to be placed in a position to do the best work in that church the Silver Bay conference is a necessity.

WILLIAM S. BENNET.

Objective Work at Lake Geneva

Presbyterian delegates led in the enrollment at the annual Lake Geneva conference of the Missionary Education Movement which opened Aug. 1 at the Y. M. C. A. camp, Williams Bay, Lake Geneva, Wis. Of these Cincinnati and vicinity are proud of sixteen Presbyterian delegates as a result of a determined effort on the part of "The World in Cincinnati" continuation committee. In the large Chicago delegation there are twenty Presbyterians. Most of the delegates attending the conference are from the large cities, including Detroit, St. Louis and Kansas City. The total enrollment of all denominations is 270.

The presiding officer of the conference is Rev. J. M. Stifler of First Baptist church, Evanston, Ill. B. Carter Millikin, secretary of the Presbyterian department of missionary education, is dean of mission study. Mrs. Thomas Knox of Lima, Ohio, is teaching a class studying "Mexico Today," and F. R. Leach of Cincinnati, Ohio, teaches a class studying "The Challenge of the City." Rev. George H. Trull of New York has the adult Bible class in the graded Sunday school course. Rev. Charles E. Bradt of the Presbyterian Foreign Board is a delegate. F. W. Harold of New York, exposition director of the Missionary Education Movement, is in charge of exhibits and demonstrations.

The features of mission study at this year's conference are the immigration problems and China from the standpoint of Christian missions. There are three classes studying "The Emergency in China." Novel features have been the immigration pageant and demonstrations and the Japan demonstration. Sixty of the delegates dressed as immigrants from all parts of the world landed from a large barge at the dock and, conducted by members of the faculty impersonating immigration officers, proceeded as a pageant to the auditorium, where the Ellis island examination of immigrants as to their fitness to enter the United States was demonstrated at length. A set of Japanese scenery owned by the Missionary Education Movement, and especially prepared for rental to local groups, was used as a background and scenic setting for the Japanese demonstrations.

Presbyterian Reunion at Pen Mar

The annual reunion of Presbyterians of Pennsylvania, Maryland, the Virginias and the District of Columbia was held at Pen Mar Park, Pa., the last day of July. It is estimated that over 6,000 persons were present at the various gatherings. Rev. Thomas J. Ferguson was chairman of the reunion committee and Rev. H. B. King of Harrisburg secretary and treasurer. Rev. A. F. Waldo of Chambersburg had a part in the program. Instead of several addresses as in former years, one principal address was delivered by Hon. Henry Breckenridge, assistant secretary of war, on "Gettysburg—Some Thoughts Suggested by the Recent National Reunion of Veterans."

An Indian Bible School

The fourth annual camp meeting of the six Nez Perce Indian churches was held last month at Talmaks, on the mountains of Idaho. amid groves of large and small pines, springs and streams and luxuriant wild flowers. There was quite a good deal of rain the first few days, but the hundreds in camp moved around just as though no rain were falling, for Indians don't get all "fussed up" like white folks and everything went off as usual.

Dr. Lee of Seattle had charge of the English singing and trained the Indian choir. Rev. Charles F. Scafe of Spokane led a class in Bible studies. There was a sunrise prayer meeting at 5 a. m. These meetings were usually attended by from seventy-five to 100 and the entire service was in the Indian language. The children's hour at 8:30 was in charge of Rev. James Hayes. A number of them decided to be Christians and were received into the churches.

The Nez Perce Indian band, a new feature this year, with their new instruments, and the Talmaks choir furnished music. One of the Nez Perce girls, who recently returned from Whitworth College, Tacoma, played the piano. There were speeches by the men, songs and recitations by the young people.

The returned students from Carlisle, Chilocco, Chemawa and others, gave a farewell social in honor of Dr. Lee and Mr. Scafe. The camp meeting association, composed of Indian men, bought a new worship tent this year, the old one having done service for twelve years. They used it for extra meetings, but with all the extra tent space the new one was sometimes inadequate for the crowds. The association also purchased a new tent for the accommodation of white ministers who assisted in the services. This year there were ten who availed themselves of the privilege of worshiping with the Nez Perces, although they had to speak through an interpreter.

Mount Hermon Federate School

There were 126 Presbyterians registered at the Federate School of Missions held July 20-26 at Mount Hermon, in the Santa Cruz mountains of California. A total of 327 people registered at the school, besides the many others who attended lectures without registering. Mrs. D. B. Wells led the daily textbook class in "The New America" and "The King's Business." Among the prominent Presbyterian workers who attended the school of missions were Mrs. H. B. Pinney, president of the Woman's Occidental Board of Foreign Missions; Mrs. H. H. Gribben, secretary of bands; Miss Frances L. Beardsley, box secretary; Mrs. R. B. Goddard, president of the Woman's Synodical Society of Home Missions of California; Miss Margaret E. Boyce, young people's secretary; Mrs. D. U. Ross, editor of "The Far West"; Mrs. J. W. Aldrich, field secretary of the Woman's Board, New York. Rallies of different denominations were held on different afternoons, when various missionaries were heard.

Mount Hermon Federate School of Missions is destined to exert a widening influence upon our churches, and the beauty of the sequoia and madrona woods will continue to draw those who love nature.

MARY E. BAMFORD.

First Conference at Okoboji

The usual recreations of Okoboji Lake, Iowa, have been varied this year by the conference of the Interdenominational Summer School of Missions held in Arnold's park pavilion, overlooking the beautiful lake. A few faithful Christian women of different denominations conceived the idea of a mission summer school at this popular resort, and in much prayer and faith the effort was crowned with encouraging success. There was a registration of 300 representing all evangelical denominations. Though the invitations had been confined mostly to Iowa, there were ten states represented and six countries. From 400 to 600 attended many of the sessions. There were eight foreign missionaries present—Miss Lulu Golish, West China; Mrs. Laura Delany Garst, Japan; Rev. and Mrs. J. P. White, Egypt; Miss Bertha G. Johnson, India, laborer among the lepers; Miss Minnie B. Mills, Smyrna; Mrs. Anna M. T. Kelsey, Mexico, and Miss Jean Morrison, India.

A part of each day was devoted to study from "The King's Business," led by Mrs. J. P. White, formerly of Egypt. There were classes in lines of study for old and young. After paying all expenses of the convention a balance remained in the treasury and the ladies have organized the summer school as a permanent institution, with two from each denomination as a board of directors. Mrs. Flora Pearson Dudley of Indianola, Iowa, is president.

JOHN H. CARPENTER.

Christian Citizenship at Winona

Beginning Aug. 11 and continuing to the 21st inclusive, the ninth annual Christian Citizenship Institute is in session at Winona Lake, Ind., under the direction of the National Reform Association. Each day except the Sabbath addresses are given at 9, 9:30, 10 and 11 a. m., and 4 o'clock in the Assembly auditorium.

Rev. Grant W. Sower, Ohio field secretary, has as the subject of a series of lectures "Social Uplift." Dr. James S. Martin, superintendent of the association, speaks on "The Bible in the Schools," answering objections that have been made to the Scriptures in the public schools. Dr. Lyman E. Davis of the Methodist Protestant Church is giving a course of lectures upon "Literary Forces in Social Progress."

In addition to these speakers several prominent men from foreign countries, who were popular speakers at the recent world's Christian citizenship conference at Portland, were invited. Rev. G. H. L. Beeman, Indiana field secretary of the association, is actively interested in the institute.

Growing Success of Hollister Assembly

Last year there were more than 1,500 persons in attendance at the Presbyterian Assembly near Hollister, Mo., but it is expected that the conference now in progress will surpass the mark set in 1912. Preceding the reggular Bible conference a young people's camp was held. The visitors at the meetings were chiefly from Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Tennessee.

to have been reached to the effect that where one of the churches of a denomination is being successfully maintained and the other is invited to open a new church, no step will be taken without first having a full and frank conference with the district or state authorities of the church occupying the field to secure their consent and cooperation. At points where a church of one of the denominations is weak it may be invited to join the stronger organization. At Plankinton a union of churches is to be made, whereby the Presbyterians will take over the Congregational society with the expectation that one church will be much more effective than the two have been.

Indiana

Churches of South Bend at their first communions following the W. A. Sunday meetings received the following additions: First 210, Westminster 166, Trinity 136, Mishawaka 62. Since then more have been received.

Rochester church will soon come into the possession of a legacy of $9,000 let it over two years ago, as the legal questions involved have been settled. This church has been the recipient of several legacies during the past few years.

New York

LeRoy church is about to expend $5,000 on improvements to its edifice. The plans provide for additional classrooms, session room, dining room, kitchen and horse and automobile shed.

A mortgage of $4,000 has been paid off by Oakfield church. At the last communion two adults were received on confession and three infants baptized. The attendance at Sunday services and Sabbath school has increased 30 to 40 per cent. The church edifice and the manse are being renovated. Rev. S. D. Angel is pastor.

Pennsylvania

Joseph H. Odell, D. D., pastor of First church, Scranton, and also editor of The Tribune Republican of that city, has been asked to run for mayor on a nonpartisan ticket.

Rev. Joseph Howell was recently installed pastor of South church in Easton, the following clergymen participating: John F. Stonecipher, D. D.; Rev. Horace D. Sassaman, Rev. William Bulloch, Rev. Ethelbert D. Warfield, D. D., and Rev. Harvey Klaer.

New Jersey

Plans have been completed for Third Presbyterian church, South, of Newark calling for a building which, it is announced, will cost $70,000, as part of a collegiate project. A passageway to the present building of Clinton Avenue church, which will affiliate with Third church, has been provided for. The project involves the alliance of Clinton Avenue and High Street churches with Third church and the formation of a new congregation in Forest Hill. The new church of the latter congregation is to be known as Third church, North. Its corner stone was laid several weeks ago.

Five boys 12 to 14 years of age were received into the membership of Clayton church July 13. These boys were members of a class which had met with the pastor, Rev. Samuel A. Harker, on several preceding Sabbaths for special instruction and counsel.

California

First church at Hanford, Rev. John Steele pastor, has lately completed its new edifice. It is 72 by 110 feet in size, with special provision for Sunday school and young people's work and numerous modern features. The building and its furnishings are estimated to have cost approximately $31,000, inclusive of a pipe organ. Hanford is the county seat of King's county and is the center of a rich fruit and agricultural region. The church organization dates back nearly thirty years, but the present pastorate is less than three years old.

INFORMATION ASKED FOR EVERY-MEMBER CANVASS

Has your church endeavored to adopt the budget or weekly pledge plan for benevolences? If so, you are asked to see that the following data are furnished by Sept. 1, if at all possible, to Rev. A. F. McGarrah, 705 Odd Fellows' building, St. Louis, who has been appointed to direct Presbyterian activities in the nationwide interdenominational "simultaneous every-member canvass" next March:

1. When did your church adopt the plan? Peculiar problems and difficulties and how overcome?
2. Effects on (a) benevolences, (b) regular church income, (c) general work of the church? If plan used several years, results year by year.
3. Was an every-member canvass made? If so, how many were seen? How many pledges made? How many contributed to benevolences without making pledge?
4. What was former plan? Compare per capita (or total) gifts under old plan and under new plan?

Reply as fully as possible to the following questions at the same time or later:

5. Attitude of officers toward system before trial and after. Peculiar objections and how overcome?
6. When was canvass made? Number of canvassers? Length of canvass? Was it thorough? If not, why not? Did any subscribers reduce church support to add to benevolences? How much?
7. Compare number of givers to church support and benevolences. Compare per capita and total gifts also.
8. To what do you attribute the success or failure of the system?
9. Will system be continued? How can the boards or any agency help your church to a more effective working of the plan?
10. Send samples of all printed matter used, pledge cards (if in any way unusual), publicity material, etc.

Boards and denominations representing 20,000,000 American Protestants are officially and enthusiastically cooperating under the leadership of the Laymen's Movement. This year sees the climax of ten years of missionary agitation. A denominational conference will be held in Chicago Sept. 3-4, at which time the information furnished by presbyteries and churches will be considered.

Foreign-Speaking Americans on Their Way to College at Dubuque

Last year an average of 1152 Germans each week came to make America their home. Twice as many Italians and Poles likewise came here to stay. These and other foreign speaking peoples were added to the many thousand already scattered over the country. They all need spiritual guidance, and can best be reached by men of their own race. It is not difficult to find men to carry Christian citizenship ideals to them, when a true religious statesmanship in our own church has provided means whereby these men may be trained. Dubuque German College and Seminary for many years has been educating foreign speaking men as Presbyterian ministers. Many of its graduates are now faithfully serving congregations in the Central West.

We shall be glad to tell you more about this work. Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D.D., President, Dubuque, Ia.

The young woman who becomes dissatisfied with her college or boarding school usually feels that she is wasting her time. She is not interested. We strive to get the undivided interest of the student from the very first—to bring out all her good qualities, and to help her to make herself a cultured, efficient Christian woman. We desire

Around the Shop

Continent readers, good, sensible folk that they are, enjoy their play and rest times with the same heartiness that they put into their work. But their minds do not go wool gathering. Most of them have The Continent follow them, and in the months to come many a sermon will be stronger, many an effort more efficient, because of the undistracted reading and thinking of the summer. "Rest" need not mean mental stagnation.

One reader's hammock reveries have had this effect:

A LAZY-DAY ANAGRAM

Deep in content I lie,
  Beneath this shading tree,
Under the cloud-fleeted sky,
  And listen to bird and bee.
The unrest of the world
  Matters not to me.
Were battle flags unfurled,
  I would not care to see.

The wind may blow from arctic snow
To Mexico,
From Ispahan to far Japan,
It's all the same. For I know a man
Who all day hops around
Looking for news. When found,
He prints and sends to me. And this is why, content, in this shaded nook I lie so lazily
  this summer day.

A. L. D.

A. L. D. sends this accompanying note:

"The Man Around the Shop—Dear Sir: Thank you for the bright and cheery way in which you put things in the bit of space allowed to you. I hope it will bring you more advertisers and more subscribers."

Happy thought! Persuade your friends to subscribe now, before the coal bills begin to come in, then have them watch our advertising columns for the announcement of heaters that will cut from their coal bills many times the cost of the subscription.

Human Wrong in Church Disunion

THE DENOMINATIONAL DIVISIONS OF THE CHURCH HAVE ALL COME OUT OF HUMAN FAILINGS, ERRORS AND MISDEEDS.

It seems necessary to say this again very emphatically because some people these days are trying to head off church union by scattering the idea that God is responsible for splitting up the church into sects and denominations—that he would rather have it so than to have all his followers joined in one organization.

This comes shudderingly close to sacrilege. It is only by confused, crooked and prejudiced thinking that it is possible for a Christian to say such a thing.

It is important, therefore, to cultivate straight thinking on the subject. Let us try to begin it by setting down this proposition:

If all followers of Jesus Christ from the time of the apostles until now had understood his message in perfect simplicity and had followed his will with perfect devotion, there would still today be just one undivided Christian church in the world as there was on the day of Pentecost.

Perhaps it will be responded that this observation, however undeniable, is quite useless to take space with because the condition it implies is unimaginable. The followers of Jesus never have understood him perfectly nor ever done his will with perfect hearts.

But that instead of being a reason for not setting forth the ideal, is the very reason for keeping it in mind. For it refutes at once the horrid claim that God is the author of division in the church.

There was, on the contrary, not the slightest seed or germ of division in the gospel Christ intrusted to his disciples. If it could have been practiced without flaw, it would have brought men everywhere into oneness.

The very different course of affairs in the actual experience of Christendom, resulting in schisms innumerable, is therefore no part of the plan and work of God, except as human liberty is always the plan of God.

In accordance with the invariable divine method of governing men, Jesus Christ bequeathed to his dispicles no infallible purity or infallible knowledge, but left them free both to blunder and to sin.

So every cleavage in the church and separation between brethren which has happened among Christians from their Lord's departure until this day has been the fruit of somebody's sin or somebody's blunder.

Let us be clear about this and let us not blame God—unless we disagree with him about the wisdom of human liberty.

This is not saying that schism is a sin. In many an instance schism has been the only visible resort of protest and defense against the intrusion of unchristian teachings and practices into the church.

Such by the universal opinion of Protestants was the case when Luther, Calvin, Knox and the whole reformation church revolted against Rome. Obviously these leaders had God's blessing on their assertion of truth and liberty through division.

Nevertheless it stands true that if the will of God had been perfectly done in the world there would have been no division, for if the Roman Church had fully followed Christ there would have been no occasion for separating from it. So even the existence of Protestantism reflects not divine purpose but human shortcomings.

That is the best that can be said for the most justifiable and tolerable of sectarian distinctions in the Christian world. Of comparatively few other cleavages in Christendom is it possible for impartial judgment to speak so leniently. Most of the Protestant denominations have grown from disputes in which faults of stubbornness and uncharity have been outstanding on both sides.

Dogmatic insistence on points obviously unconnected with the living of Christ's life, has been met on the opposite part with selfish refusal to grant just liberties of preference and practice. And the Christian strife engendered has been quieted only when brethren who should have dwelt together have gone apart into separate households.

In other instances temporary differences of view and interest have, by lofty pride of opinion on both sides, been magnified and prolonged into irreconcilable bitterness where a little forbearance on either hand would soon have brought out all concerned into a broad place of agreement.

All in all, there are but few denomination-forming controversies which can now be fairly reviewed without exposing on each hand pettiness and pettishness, misconception and misrepresentation, and withal a vast degree of holier-than-thou Pharisaism.

But the purpose of present allusion to these matters is not to set anyone to apportioning the blame for divisions in the past. The sole object is to overcome that fictitious obstacle to present church union which is created by disseminating the notion that denominational differences are something to be proud over.

This false pride will do Christianity immeasurable harm if it is allowed to bind the church down to its present state of cleavage. The divisions themselves may by various devices be rendered reasonably innocuous pending their disappearance. But pride in them and boastfulness over them can only be ruinous.

The true thought about them is this:

Denominational differences and distinctions are badges of human frailty, signifying always somebody's fault somewhere of either insufficient understanding or insufficient consecration, and therefore as the church goes on to perfection in knowledge and grace, these badges of frailty must gradually disappear.

If they are not disappearing, the church is not progressing. A church not wanting them to disappear is far from its Lord.

Getting these recognitions into the prevalent Christian mind puts the church in the right attitude toward church union.

It makes denominationalism, however needful in "times of this present distress," a thing to be outgrown. It prepares the whole church to lament it as a heritage of the flesh and to long for its ultimate disappearance.

And with that attitude established all church union movements may be watched without anxiety. They will then advance neither by compromise on the one hand nor by constraint on the other, but by prayerful effort on the part of all Christians to understand and appreciate one another's tenets, while all labor together to enlarge the bounds of Christian liberty and reduce the exactions of ecclesiastical law.

New York Governor Impeached; Fight for the Office

People of New York state, as well as the rest of the country, were shocked by the impeachment of Governor William Sulzer last week and the accompanying spectacle of two men claiming the office of governor, with armed guards at the doors of the executive chambers at Albany, the great seal of the state chained to the governor's desk and active planning of legal battles in advance of the trial of the impeachment charges by the state senate set for September 18. The house of representatives, after bitter discussion, voted the impeachment charges, containing eight counts, the chief ones being that Mr. Sulzer used money given him for campaign purposes for stock speculation and used his position as governor to direct legislation to affect the stock market; that his sworn statement of campaign expenses and expenditures "was false and intended to be false," inasmuch as eleven specific contributions were omitted; that he had improperly influenced witnesses and that he had traded executive approval of bills for support of the direct primary measure. The latter is a charge which the public might regard as negligible, but which was peculiarly offensive in the eyes of the Tammany organization.

The outstanding feature of the proceedings so far as developed up to the first of the week is a victory for Tammany. It is not at all probable that the governor would have had to face impeachment if he had been more pliable—in a word, if he had not broken with Charles F. Murphy, the boss of Tammany Hall. William Sulzer is a Democrat who had been well known as an energetic member of Congress; he was elected over the Republican and Progressive candidates in 1912 and took office under favorable circumstances. But his official conduct thereafter was vastly displeasing to his Tammany backers and at the same time he failed to win the full confidence and approval of patriotic citizens who place public welfare above partisan politics. But his defiance of Tammany in matters of patronage and policy resulted in an attack on him at all the points where his armor might be vulnerable. A damage suit brought by a woman failed to excite the public, but an investigation started by a legislative committee headed by Senator Frawley uncovered evidence more difficult for the governor to answer. A plea by the wife of the governor that she had appropriated certain of her husband's campaign checks without his knowledge and her temporary physical collapse added an element of pathos to a highly regrettable situation.

Governor Sulzer and his army of lawyers made the technical points that the legislature assembled in special session had no right to consider impeachment charges and that the filing of these charges did not suspend the governor from office pending the trial; therefore the governor insisted on holding his seat in spite of the efforts of his opponents to install Lieutenant-Governor M. H. Glynn as acting governor. The legislature and a majority of the state officials, however, recognize the authority of Mr. Glynn.

Mexican President Takes the Offensive

President Huerta of Mexico suddenly broke off diplomatic relations with the United States on Monday after making a peremptory demand for recognition of his government. Nelson O'Shaughnessy, in charge of the American embassy, was given his passports and requested to leave the country within forty-eight hours. Ex-Governor John Lind, the American special commissioner, and William Bayard Hale, President Wilson's personal investigator, have no official status according to the Mexican president's ideas. Two notes were sent to Washington from Mexico City, the first note stating that President Huerta would "tolerate no interference," even though it might be characterized as friendly mediation, such as was proposed through Commissioner Lind. This note included the demand for recognition, and the second note asked for a reply to the first communication before midnight. Huerta's "ultimatum" was issued before the contents of President Wilson's message had been made public, evidently with the intention of forcing a crisis before the Mexican people had had an opportunity to consider the pacific plans of the American government. A foreign war would serve to quiet the constitutionalists, or rebels, in Mexico, and would postpone elections by which Huerta might be unseated.

Previous to this crisis the British foreign office issued a statement minimizing the importance of its action in recognizing the Huerta government, the explanation being that the recognition was only to a provisional president pending an election. To the British statement was appended the following explanation of why France and Germany had recognized the murdered Madero's successor: "The French and German governments also recognized President Huerta after a reception by him of the whole diplomatic party, at which a congratulatory speech was made in their behalf by the American ambassador."

Retiring Ambassador Wilson publicly took violent exception to this reference to himself and denied absolutely that the policy of the powers had been affected by his speech. The ambassador asserted that the address in question was actually prepared by the British and Spanish ministers. The statement of the foreign office he characterized as an "unworthy subterfuge." The whole tone of the ambassador's remarks was so undiplomatic and impolitic that it drew a stinging reprimand from the President, who had Secretary Bryan cable to Ambassador Page at London to call on the British minister of foreign affairs and apologize.

Japan made a move calculated to gain America's good will in declining to receive General Felix Diaz as a special envoy of President Huerta. The incident, which amounts to a rebuff for the Huerta regime, indicates that the Japanese government is not carrying on an intrigue with Mexico.

Drought and Extreme Heat in the Corn Belt

From the Central West and Southwest, covering a large part of the great corn belt section of the country, have come reports of almost unprecedented drought. Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma had several weeks of sizzling heat—heat so terrific that it has paralyzed crops, caused water famines and general misery. Kansas has had the driest season in its history, beginning with the month of May, and since then heat waves have followed one another in rapid succession. Streams and wells have run dry; Olathe, Lawrence, Medicine Lodge and other Kansas towns have exhausted their water supply, and the water shortage extends into Oklahoma. In Kansas City thousands of persons have been sleeping in the parks or in any available outdoor spot.

Cattle have been rushed to market because of failure of forage, and the same thing has happened to poultry because the extreme heat has, it is asserted, made the hens stop laying. Threshing has been done at night to avoid the heat. The only pleasant feature connected with the unusual temperature—which almost constantly ranged above 100 degrees—is that the dryness annihilated the mosquitoes.

Corn suffered most from the weather conditions, and it is positively predicted that there will be a very material falling off from last year's bumper yield. Other crops will also show a decrease over 1912, but outside of the area specially afflicted by drought the harvest is expected to be moderately full.

Physicians of the World Attend Medical Congress

There were more than 7,000 physicians from various parts of the world in attendance at the quadrennial international medical congress, which closed last week in London after what is considered the most successful meeting in the modern history of medicine. Prince Arthur of Connaught and Earl Grey, the latter representing the British government, opened the congress, and John Burns, also a government representative, made the closing address, speaking on the relationship of medicine to the public health, praising the doctors for the vast improvements they and their brothers of the profession had effected in the cure and prevention of disease. Mr. Burns asserted that general medical reasearch is about to receive assistance from the state on a scale not heretofore contemplated. On this point he said: "The chief impediment which has stood in the way of the government in making this expenditure has been wastefulness, and one source of waste expenditure—military and naval armaments—stands head and shoulders above all others. If that waste can be prevented gigantic sums will be released for reforms which are waiting to be financed."

Delegates to the convention were especially honored by the king and queen of England, and the importance of the gathering and of the work and workers represented was fully recognized. This was the first time that the congress had been held in London for over thirty years. Delegates from the United States and Great Britain were more numerous than those from any other country. Sir Thomas Barlow, president of the Royal College of Physicians and president of the congress, paid a special tribute to the United States for the work done by the government surgeons in the Philippines, the Panama canal zone and elsewhere in combating yellow fever, malaria and the sleeping sickness.

Considerable attention was given to the subject of alcoholism and temperance. Dr. Laguer of Weisbaden took the view that parental alcoholism was responsible for much of the degeneracy of children. Another speaker testified to the spread of temperance in every rank of society in the British isles, including the army and navy, where the younger officers were setting a good example to their men. The use of alcohol in hospitals and by medical men generally was said to have greatly decreased. Sessions of the congress were interrupted and disturbed by the militant suffragists. The city of Munich will be the next meeting place in 1917.

New British "Second Chamber" Predicted

David Lloyd George, chancellor of the British exchequer, has emerged without permanent harm from the scandal of his Marconi wireless telegraph stock speculation and has girded his loins for renewed fighting in behalf of the reform program of the Liberal ministry, in which he is the most important figure saving only Premier Asquith. Lloyd George is at once both intensely admired and hated in Great Britain; his friends call him "courageous" and his opponents use the word "audacious."

Ten thousand men and women from all parts of North Wales greeted him at Carnarvon a few days ago, and to them he spoke in Welsh and English alternately. He began with a reference to the fact that the Tory party was under the correct impression that he was preparing a great attack upon its arbitrary powers, and added, "The vitriol throwers have failed either to kill, to maim, or to deface me." He affirmed that there was a "deliberate conspiracy afoot in influential quarters to thwart and overthrow democratic government," indicating thereby the house of lords and the lords' adherents outside. This led up to a reference to an important plan which the prime minister has announced for next year for reforming the house of lords and making it a new second chamber. As to this Lloyd George predicts that "it will be a chamber in which all parties, all sections and all creeds will have equal treatment."

Ten Women Members for Chicago Police Force

Chicago's police department has just been increased by ten new policewomen, or social workers, who recently began their official duties. The position was lately created by the Chicago city council, urged by the Juvenile Protective League, the Catholic Women's League, the Jewish charities and other civic associations. A committee of three women representing these organizations will lay out and supervise the work of the policewomen. The latter are to be paid $75 a month, and pending the holding of a civil service examination they will not wear uniforms. Aside from official badges or stars and police whistles they will not be armed. Bathing beaches, dance halls, amusement parks and excursion boats are among the public places which the policewomen inspect.

Religious World

Temperance Women from All the World

For the ninth time workers and adherents of the Women's Christian Temperance Union from all over the civilized world will meet this autumn at an international convention. This year the convention delegates are coming to the native nation of the movement, the United States, and the entertaining city is New York. A very eminent representation from foreign countries is expected. The Countess of Carlisle, the president of the world's union, will not be present, but her proxy will be brought by her daughter, Lady Aurea Howard. Among the British representatives will also be Miss Agnes E. Slack, the world's union secretary, and Miss Swankie Cameron, the young people's secretary. The head of the German delegation will be Fraulein von Blucher, great-grandniece of the famous field marshal whose appearance at Waterloo eclipsed the fortunes of Napoleon. Lady Holder, the president of the Australian union, and Mrs. Anderson Hughes Drew of New Zealand will be the leaders of the Australasian delegations, and Miss Ferguson, president of the Huguenot seminary at Wellington, will represent South Africa. With the larger American delegations added it is thought practically certain that this assemblage will be the largest convention of Christian women ever held.

The public sessions of the convention will all be held in the borough of Brooklyn, beginning Friday morning, October 24, at 10 o'clock. The previous evening, however, will be marked by a reception tendered to the foreign delegates at the Hotel Astor, Manhattan, by the New York state union, whose president, Mrs. Ella A. Boole, is the general chairman of the committee on convention arrangements. On the 23d likewise an all-day meeting of prayer for the convention will be held in Plymouth church, Brooklyn. The formal program includes a children's demonstration planned by Miss Gordon, the leader of the Loyal Temperance Legion, a young people's meeting an hour in the interest of political suffrage for women and an hour of discussion of social purity. But the overwhelming interest will, of course, be centered on measures for total abstinence and the movement for worldwide prohibition of the liquor traffic.

Tremendous Combination of Catholic Laity

The annual convention of the American Federation of Catholic Societies was held last week in Milwaukee. This organization combines all the various lodges and orders which the Roman prelates have indorsed as lawful for the laymen of the church—preeminent among them all the Knights of Columbus. The extent of the federation was manifest from the enormous crowds of delegates in attendance at Milwaukee—said by the daily press to have been an aggregate of no less than 30,000 persons.

A new extension of the scope of the combination was accomplished at this meeting by creation of a women's auxiliary. In this are to be comprehended the Daughters of Isabella, the Ladies' Catholic Benevolent Association and similar organizations. The federation's secretary, Anthony Matre of St. Louis, is urgently trying to obtain also the formation of a Catholic Young Men's Christian Association in order to draw away from the evangelical associations the large number of young Catholics connected with them in all American cities.

It was perhaps to be regarded as a favorable sign in the trend of the federation, however, that it sought some of the more liberal American prelates to address its popular meetings. Archbishop Keane of Dubuque took pains to declare before the assembled delegates that the federation cannot have a political program. Said he: "Catholics in this country are a cosmopolitan body professing and defending every form of political creed except socialism. There is no present or prospective crisis which could make the creation of a Catholic party possible."

Archbishop Ireland of St. Paul made an extraordinary plea for the "awakening common sense and patriotism of America to discover a remedy for the enforced secularism of the public schools." Hinting at least at a view of the question broader than the usual stubborn Romanist insistence on parochial schooling, the archbishop said:

"Not against state schools as such do I raise objections, but as to the methods in which they work—methods that, whatever the theory may be, do in fact consecrate secularism as the religion of America. Somehow, I claim, secular knowledge must be imparted to the child so as not to imperil its faith in God and Christ."

Women delegates to the convention voted with some demurring not to organize a suffrage movement. This decision was reached, it is said, largely at the instigation of Archbishop S. G. Messmer, although after the adjournment of the convention the archbishop made a statement to the effect that the Catholic Church had taken no official action on the question of votes for women. Charles I. Denechaud of New Orleans was reelected president. The 1914 convention will be held in Baltimore.

Pullman Men Organized in Christian League

A. P. T. Stephenson, cook on a Pullman buffet parlor car which runs on the Philadelphia and Reading railroad between Philadelphia and Eagles Mere, Pennsylvania, is organizing a "Pullman League of Christian Workers," whose membership is confined to the colored employees of the Pullman parlor and sleeping car service. Although the movement was begun only on last Easter, about 800 men have already signed the membership pledge:

"I pledge myself to love, honor and obey our heavenly Father; not to vainly use the name of the Lord our God; to offer a silent prayer each day for my coworkers, and to strive for higher things in this life and in the future state."

Local circles have been formed thus far in Philadelphia, Washington, Jersey City and Richmond. In the first two cities the local circles hold prayer meetings together every Sunday morning. Mr. Stephenson is an Episcopalian, belonging to St. Thomas parish in Philadelphia, but, of course, this organization is of the widest interchurch character and indeed extends beyond all churches. The porter on the same car is James Moore, a Roman Catholic, and he is a loyal member of the league.

God's Will Is Not Second Best

WHAT do we Christians think about God's will? Judging by ordinary expressions, we think it the next best thing to our own will. When it crosses ours, we speak regretfully about it. We cannot have our own way; therefore the Lord's will be done. Of course we are disappointed; our will would have suited us better; but since that cannot be, we submit to God's will. We even feel virtuous that we do not rebel. We praise each other for accepting God's will so sweetly. We talk of a man who is undergoing what is plainly a dispensation of God's providence, and say that he has uttered no word of complaint; all through it he has said, "The Lord's will be done." We count it very beautiful in him.

When we stop to think of it though, are we sure it is worthy of us? Is that, after all, the feeling we ought to have about God's will—that since we could not have our way, we will accept his way? Shall a child submit to his father's will? He may be mystified by it. He may go blindly in it, except to the fact that it is his father's will. But would not we earthly fathers feel hurt to find our children taking our will only because they cannot have their own, which they would prefer?

Instead of all this, it is certain that we ought to have an exultant feeling when we have found God's will. What a marvel it is that he should have any will for us! Who are we that he should have any plan covering our lives? Why should we not be allowed to go on our own foolish way—that way which we so much prefer—without any concern of his? And when we find that he cares, how shall we escape a sense of exultation and exhilaration? The very fact that his will differs from ours is proof that our will was a long second best, and we have been mercifully kept from it. We cannot prefer it once we know what his will is. We do not submit to his will; we spring to it. We release our own because we are sure it was not a good will.

There is a tombstone on a child's grave in England which has this inscription: "A gardener was going round the garden with his master and came upon a young and tender flower plucked off. He asked, 'Who plucked this flower?' 'I did,' replied the master. And the gardener held his peace." Yes, but the gardener did not hold his peace because he felt that he was compelled to submit to the master's will. He was raising that flower for his master and his own will was fulfilled in the will of his master. If the flower had served the master's will, it had served the gardener's will. This is easier to talk about in cold blood than to feel in the hot blood of sorrow, but it is the spirit that belongs to believers. God's will is not second best. It is uniformly and always best, and it is evidence of his own goodness when it crosses ours.

There is a great hymn of Secretary John Hay which we wish were available for wider use in the church. In it he points out that Christian believers are not called on to accept God's will in dumb resignation, or like nerveless fatalists; but that their faith is meant to soar like the eagle and to cry exulting, "O Lord, thy will be done." The next verse urges that when we go out in the service of our fellows, we are asserting not our rights, but the rights of God, and that because we are under God's will, we may not bend and writhe under the iron heel of oppression—every movement for liberty is a movement whose exulting assurance is God's will.

In his closing stanza Mr. Hay speaks of the constant service of God's will in strengthening our weakness, in giving us a standard of achievement and service; that every man who starts out to do anything for his fellows may be assured of an overruling and controlling will in which lies the assurance of victory. It is this attitude toward God's will which we so easily lose. Our minds run so readily to submission. Instead, they need to run to joyous inspiration from the existence of a will so great that it can command us and cross us if need be, and that loves us enough to do so.

Remedying an Unfortunate Exaggeration

How many good movements for reform in this excitable country have to be checked and delayed while the exaggerated assertions of their rasher advocates are discounted. Why can't crusaders make their accusations square with the facts in the first place, and so avoid the reaction which comes so disastrously in most reform causes when it is necessary to confess to the public that original charges and complaints were overdrawn?

A case in recent point is the agitation to obtain better wages for young women in stores and factories. No doubt at all that this is a right and justifiable demand. Nothing too strong has been said against the injustice of letting a young woman try to provide for herself in a modern city on $6 a week. But the prospect of replacing this injustice with justice was itself hindered, and a lot of other harm done besides, when a group of excitables hysterically ran wild with the theory that the white slaves of our cities are mainly girls forced into that hellish life because they were starving as saleswomen and factory operatives.

That this may be the truth of some cases nobody doubts, but representing it as the general explanation for women's entanglement in vice worked mischief in several directions. It gave the cover of a semirespectable excuse for weak girls to follow their own inclinations into sin; it obscured the degenerating sensuality of mind which constitutes the real snare of youth; it tended to gloze over the moral horror of vice with sentimental apology even in the minds of the pure; it spread a general suspicion of girls in these classes which was a slander on the vast majority of them; worst of all, perhaps, it took away from many a poor girl struggling with the terrible battle to pay her own honest way through life the spiritual support of a popular expectation that she would be good.

But fortunately the reaction has come. The welfare department of the National Civic Federation has conducted an important investigation into New York department stores which demonstrates that wages ought indeed to be higher for salesgirls, but that they are not as a class impure persons and that they do not recruit the ranks of vice in any greater proportion than girls in better economic circumstances. A prominent Salvation Army officer who has dealt with 1,500 degraded and unfortunate women declares that she knows not one of these whose fall can be traced to poverty. Women virtuous in soul maintain their virtue against the bitterest trial of it; women of another sort fall from estates of luxury as well as from conditions of want.

This rational appraisal of the situation is further confirmed by a statement signed by Professors J. W. Jenks, Graham Taylor and C. R. Henderson, along with many other social experts of authority, who protest against "linking the wage scale with the so-called white slave problem." Reason thus seems once more in command of the agitation, and it is to be hoped that without depletion of zeal effort may now go forward equally to obtain living pay for girls behind counters and at machines, and likewise to redeem from the grip of men's lust and their own sin the unhappy sirens of the underworld. It is a most auspicious time to demonstrate that saving and helping enthusiasms need not be less warm and eager for being sensible.

Comity That Should Be Broadened

The Continent hears with exceeding pleasure the report of Dr. John Fox, returning from England, that an understanding has been reached between the American Bible Society and the British and Foreign Bible Society whereby some of the overlapping of their respective activities is to be eliminated. The British society gives up Central America and the American society gives up Persia. Each, of course, becomes responsible for the work which the other abandons. Now The Continent trusts that there will come speedy announcement of a similar happy end for the long rivalry of these two organizations in Korea, from which field we are fully persuaded that the American society ought wholly to withdraw, as it has done from Persia. There is no imaginable excuse for colporteurs of two missionary agencies to tramp the same ground with Bibles; there is too much land on the globe untrod by Bible distributers to justify that sort of double-ply competition in any part of it. The Continent is aware that this Korean dispute is a complicated one, with much argument possible on each side. But it is high time to drop the argument and apply the excellent solution which Abraham proposed to Lot. If the American Bible Society has to pitch its tent toward Sodom, all the better. Lot couldn't stand it, but the American Bible Society is better fortified.

"Daddy" George on Smashing Windows and Jaws

All the while that The Outlook has been carrying on a discussion of what the schoolboy Good should say when his teacher asked who broke the window through which he had seen Bad throw a stone, we have been feeling something decidedly wrong in the overwhelming majority opinion that Good should refuse to tell. But we have not been able to get at a satisfactory expression of our disapproval until William R. George, the famous founder of the George Junior Republic, helps us out by a discussion of the matter in The Survey. His opinion is, of course, unique, as is everything that "Daddy" George says or does. He cries down the whole idea that there can possibly be a separate boy world in which the honorable are excused from helping to protect property and persons from the mischief of the disorderly. Very forcibly Mr. George says that if that is made the rule for boys, it is folly to expect them to change later into men who will take risk to themselves in order to defend the social order. It is this sort of thing, Mr. George affirms, "which is playing the mischief with our social conditions."

Instead of this folly, the famous friend of growing lads holds that from the earliest age of accountability boys should be taught that they are bound to help keep order and uphold the right in the world. But to save them from the supposed unmanliness of being talebearers to those in authority, Mr. George says there ought in every school to be at least some of the authority for enforcing rules and order deposited with the boys themselves. His solution for the problem that The Outlook has discussed would be to make it Good's business, when he saw Bad about to throw a stone, to threaten the culprit with punishment then and there. "Bad, if you do that I will smash you one in the jaw," is Mr. George's idea of the proper attitude of a well minded youth who realizes his obligation to society around him.

—The Knights of Columbus in their central national organization have taken official measures to induce the postmaster general, if they can, to exclude from the mails the anti-Catholic weekly published in Aurora, Missouri—The Menace. The Continent has no confidence in The Menace at all—does not regard it as in any sense a credit or a strength to Protestantism. We both detest its spirit and doubt its sincerity. Nevertheless we see clearly that if Catholic influence should appear at all likely to accomplish its object in this direction, every American loyal to the original ideas of the republic must stand up in defense of The Menace, obnoxious though it is. If a precedent were established for suppressing The Menace by a blanket executive order simply because it criticises Catholicism, no paper would thereafter be safe which pointed out the tyrannies of Rome in even the mildest terms. The principle of free speech and free press in this country is no academic thesis; it is a vital necessity for a free democracy. The sincere democrat therefore must stand up for the liberty of saying and printing many things that he himself likes neither to see nor hear. But of course the Roman Church, being in fundamental nature the most anti-democratic organization on earth, can have no appreciation of any such liberty and fits itself to this American condition only under stress of necessity. In consequence, it must be watched with special keenness where the liberty of the press is involved. There are laws sufficient to keep The Menace from printing slander and obscenity, and if the Romanists can curb it any under those laws, well and good. But they must not be allowed to go a step farther than that.

—As soon as the drinking of liquor shall have been made unpopular the prohibition movement will have on its side a vast ocean of additional public sentiment. The American Issue says truly that the saloon is the only business ashamed of its best customer. Drinking among railway employees is rapidly diminishing and splendid advances are being made among other workmen by the spread of information regarding the lessened efficiency of men who indulge in alcoholic drinks of any sort. The poster campaign in Massachusetts, which is proclaiming from billboards and trees the physical degeneracy which accompanies the use of alcohol, may be but the beginning of a widespread use of modern means of publicity for this purpose. The W. C. T. U. of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in an address to the convention of the State Saloonkeepers' Association, very cleverly took advantage of an opportunity to call attention to the disrepute in which their business is held. The mayor of the city had welcomed them, as mayors do all conventions. The women immediately sent the convention a communication suggesting that a large proportion of the population could welcome them only as despoilers of young men and destroyers of homes.

—The National Council of the Young Men's Christian Associations in Great Britain is laying out plans for a national movement in the winter of 1914-15 which will be styled the Christian Manhood Campaign. It will be based in general upon the plans of the American Men and Religion Movement of 1911-12. Fred B. Smith, on his way home from his Australian campaign, and Fred S. Goodman and Frank W. Ober, while in Britain for the world's conference of Young Men's Christian Associations, helped along the counsels of the British leaders with pertinent advice from American experience.

—The statistics of the internal revenue commissioner showing another big increase last year in the aggregate of liquor made and sold in this country constitutes a peculiar puzzle in face of the unquestionable advance of America's temperance sentiment. What becomes of all the whisky nowadays is as much of a conundrum as what becomes of all the pins. But the common-sensed Yankee is constitutionally more skeptical of tables of statistics than of the testimony of his own eyes, and in this case out of his own personal observation he will decline to doubt that the men who lead America and the men who do its work—business men and artisans—are actually drinking less and less year after year, no matter what the internal revenue office says about it. Assuredly the responsible part of American life is sobering up or down, as one may prefer to look at it. That suggests the fear that the irresponsible part—the idle and sensual at both extremes of the social scale—may be absorbing very much in excess of their proportionate share of the contents of the cup that inebriates, and such may be the real explanation of the government's reports. Besides, it cannot be questioned that the mail order trade with dry towns and states has been a mighty big boon to the liquormaker, and especially to the wholesaler. But if the new Webb law really has the virtue in it which has been attributed to it, the effect of that ought to be visible by the end of another year. Perhaps the figures of whisky consumption in the middle of 1914 will reveal the force of that statute and indicate the beginning of the slump in this particular which all unselfish citizens are waiting eagerly to see.

—From the appreciation which it evoked at the time of its publication, we cannot doubt that most readers of these pages recall with gratitude Miss Mabel McKee's delicate little story, "The Heart of the Rose"—a wise and understanding sister's interpretation to her younger brother of the sacred meaning imbedded in his chivalric instincts toward womanhood. Many at the first appearance of the unpretentious tale expressed the strong feeling that it bore an appeal which ought to be made universally to American youth and desired that it should be put in form for wider distribution. All such will now hear with satisfaction that "The Heart of the Rose" has been reprinted by Revell in an inviting little booklet, which embodies all the possibilities of a tract without the guise of one. In a shape so pleasing the story ought to interest thousands of lads on the verge of manhood. In any city it would be an act of eminently useful social spirit to donate to the high school authorities enough of these booklets to put one into the hands of every high school boy. And any man who has close contact with boy life in the latter "teens" would do well to carry two or three copies constantly in his pockets to loan at auspicious times to his boy friends. The Continent believes there is the ministration of many saved lives wrapped up in Miss McKee's story.

—It is heartening to see that The Christian Index, Baptist organ of Georgia, has mustered courage—though somewhat tardily—to denounce that atrocious scene in the Southern Baptist Convention at St. Louis last May, when Mr. Napier, a missionary from China, was hooted off the platform because he advised that Baptists should unite with other denominations in conducting Christian schools in that land. We fear no other voice among Southern Baptists has openly confessed the shame of the occurrence. It was the most disgraceful incident that has happened in any religious convention in this country for many a long year. The apologies of The Index are some slight atonement, but nothing less than a formal act of confession and penitence in the next convention can relieve Southern Baptists in general from the smirch. Indeed, the only thing which will thoroughly vindicate them is to take Mr. Napier's advice, and we are sorry to note that even The Index is against that.

—Tent meetings in connection with summer evangelistic campaigns in the big cities are a quite recent innovation in American religious methods, but they have already appealed to art. One of the paintings which hang today in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City is styled "Tent Meeting in a City Slum." The artist is Jerome Myers. The handling of the subject is an excellent demonstration that Mr. Myers was not astray in sensing artistic possibility in the scene. The shadowy figures which stand outside the tent just at the edge of its circle of light are done with special impressiveness and are strikingly true to the life of crowded slum streets.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

Power of Words

SUPPOSE every word we spoke were to become incarnate and move about in our midst, a visible presence reflecting its own nature! With what kind of beings should we be populating the world—angelic or fiendish, gracious or repellent? Should we care to see our words if they were suddenly to visualize themselves in their appropriate flesh? Words do not become incarnate in this way, nevertheless they are mighty unseen ministers, ever at work, weaving nets of wickedness or robes of righteousness. There is a very striking phrase in the book of Jeremiah—"the fruit of the lips." The figure suggests that everything in life finds its supreme expression at the lips; as a tree culminates in the fruit, so life and character culminate in our speech. The state of the tongue is an index to the condition of our health; and figuratively, the state of our tongue, the condition of our speech, is an index to the health or sickness of the soul.

An Index to Life in a Man's Habitual Speech

A man's character may be inferred from his favorite and most prevailing words. What sort of words do we use? Are our biggest words the words that carry most of our desire and ambition? Are they materialistic words, dealing only with things, with "the passing show," with "the garish day," with business, or pleasure? Are they words which we shall no longer require when this life is over? There are piles of words which will become obsolete when time is no more.

Take these words from a sentence used by a man who had "pulled down his barns to build greater." "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years. Take thine ease, eat, drink, be merry." How many of these words will survive? Goods, ease, eat, drink, merry—all these will fly away with the flight of time. The only word which will survive from the sentence is the cardinal word "soul." Well, is this a suggestive example of the words which play the most prominent part in our daily speech, or are our big words not market words, not mere society words but spiritual terms, packed with eternal significance?

There are words which can live in either clime, and will be at home either on earth or in heaven. They will retain their content, independently of death, because they represent things that cannot fade, and that death itself is impotent to destroy. Recall some of the favorite words of the apostle Paul—grace, mercy, peace, love, joy, faith, salvation, glory. Not one of these will become obsolete when the earthly pilgrimage is finished. Or rehearse some of the favorite words of the Master: Life, love, faith, belief, eternal, know, bread. These are words which express eternal realities and they will have significance in the eternal world.

So do I say that if our biggest words, the words we use to express our sense of the biggest things, were all set out before us in ranks, we should be able to infer something very vital and significant concerning the quality and movements of the inner life. By the fruit of our lips we stand revealed.

Judgments of Others Reveal the Judge's Self

A man's character may be inferred from the words he uses in speaking of others. There is a striking saying of Eugene Marbau: "One judges a man more surely by what he says of others than by what others say of him." I think that sentence cuts very deep, and is a very clear and decisive expression of the truth. When we inspect a man's judgments, we are virtually examining his character. A man's criticisms are windows through which we can look into his own soul. We reveal ourselves in the words in which we judge our fellows. When a man steps on to the judge's bench and begins to criticise his brother, it is not so much the prisoner at the bar who is turned inside out as the judge himself.

Judged, then, by my words of judgment, what am I like? Is my spirit magnanimous or pusillanimous? Am I concerned with big things or little things? Have I big views or petty views? Am I peeping around the corner of the blind, or are my blinds all up and the windows open and am I facing life with noble candor? Do I stand revealed as a great soul in quest of a great God, or do I stand revealed like Bunyan's man with the muck rake? Am I peevish, or am I genial? Do my words reveal a querulous and petulant disposition, fitful and ill-tempered?

There are some words that are snappy and testy, like the shot from a gatling gun. Such words tell us little about the victims of the shot, but they tell a great deal about the gunner. Whenever these sharp ill-natured words are fired it is the gunner who stands revealed. We placard our qualities in our criticisms. When we deliver judgment the onlooker knows whether behind the words there is a vinegar manufactory or a vineyard.

Then again a man's character may be inferred by his unhallowed, illegitimate use of words. For words may be made of spurious metal, or they may be issued with light weight. A word may not represent the truth, but the untruth, and may thus reveal the untrue soul that minted it. Our Master warned us against this illicit use of speech. "Let thy yea be yea, and thy nay nay." There has to be a scrupulous correspondence between the word and the thing which it represents.

The positive "yea" is not to be impaired with a bit of "nay" mixed up with it, and the negative "nay" is not to be adulterated with a bit of the positive concealed in it. There are to be no reservations in our speech, our words are to tally exactly with the things. And therefore does our Master teach us the sanctity of the measured word. When the "yea" is "yea" and the "nay" is "nay" we are defended against all falsehoods, against all exaggerations, against all deceitful belittlements, against all ambiguities, against all Jesuitry where words are not intended to mean what they say. Scrupulous souls express themselves in scrupulous speech, and wherever words are used perversely they reflect the perversity of the soul within.

How are we to avoid this misuse of the sacred gift of speech? First of all, by the ministry of prayer. In the very second sentence of the prayer taught us by our Lord we are bidden to guard the sanctity of our speech. "Hallowed be thy name." We are not to use the Father's name lightly, cheaply, impairing its value by our indifference. We are to speak it with deep thoughtfulness, filling it with reverent significance. A man who begins by hallowing the name of God will hallow every word in his communion with God. And this sacred discipline will show its holy influence upon our common speech. Whenever prayer is profoundly real, every word being minted in sincerity, common speech will be speedily sanctified.

And secondly, we are to achieve the sanctified use of words by a deeper consecration. "Take my lips." The sanctified life has often exceedingly narrow limits; it does not throw its claims round about the entire circuit of our days. And among the things that are commonly left out of the holy circle is the ministry of speech. The conscious and deliberate purpose to make our speech the home of holy aspiration will itself defend us from all impiety and from all the many guises of vanity and falsehood. J. H. JOWETT.

It May Be Here and Now

I'm glad there is a place where joy will be complete—
No mingling there of bitter with the sweet!
But why await till after while? Our heav'n may be
With us just now! Each day and year for you and me
Comes bright with hope and rich in prophecy!
True happiness depends on what we are within—
Right here and now may heav'n for us begin!

I am glad that sometime all pain shall be no more,
No suff'ring there—no grief on yonder shore!
How oft indeed from lives of pain and sore distress
There come to us those ministries which soothe and bless,
While faith serene rebukes our faithlessness!
Beyond the here and now within that better land—
Perhaps we'll see sometime and understand!

I'm glad that just above the heavy clouds o'ercast
There's rainbow bright—the shadows will not last.
The unknown tomorrow may bring some sweet surprise,
We cannot see the way or where our journey lies—
A path all dark or one 'neath sunny skies.
The watchful eye, the eager and receptive mind
In ev'ry circumstance some good may find!

I'm glad a time will come when crime and war shall cease—
Love's banner then of universal peace!
Even now there are songs of triumph in the night,
Victory gives new courage for the stress, the fight!
The powers of evil tremble—right is right!
Nearer, still nearer that glad, that glorious day,
When light shall drive the darkness all away!

JOSEPH HENRY AYERS.

How England's "Ugliest" City Was Mothered

BY MARY E. McDOWELL

IN THAT ugliest city of Great Britain—Oldham, the center of the cotton textile industry—I found a lady mayor. The people with whom I gossiped told me that she was made mayor because she cared more for Oldham than did anyone else.

I was desirous of discovering how she had proved herself to be a citizen of such repute, so I begged the lady mayor to allow me to see her. This she did in her own gracious, simple manner: "Would I take tea with them at 4:30?" came to me over the telephone while I was held in Manchester by the great railroad strike of the summer of 1910. Because of the strikers soldiers were quartered in the railroad station as they were in many other English cities. The lady mayor had three strikes on her hands, I heard, and yet she had not called on the militia, a fact that made her more significant and interesting. On the morning of that Saturday before I drank tea with her she had settled the strike of the municipal trams, or street railways, after, as she told me, "we had talked thirteen hours, then laughed together, and then settled the trouble."

Lady Mayor Going to Open a Gymnasium on Site of an Old Slum

I was reminded, as I talked with her, of what a Scotch miner at Cherry had said to me a few days after that tragic day when the mine was sealed in order that the internal fires might be quenched. The mine owners were unable to make the Italian and Polish women understand that it was the only hope of saving their dear ones who were down below. And because they could not make these crazed wives and mothers understand they had to call the militia from a neighboring town. This Scotch miner, as we stood at the opening of the mine, said: "If only we could have had a dozen women with sympathy and understanding to put their friendly hands on these crazy, foreign women and tell them all about it, we need never have called in the soldiers." Because, as I found, this lady mayor had understanding and sympathy she was able to treat with the strikers and did not need soldiers.

Oldham is monotonously ugly, and more hopelessly ugly than is the Chicago stock yards district, for our houses are temporary, while theirs are of stone, well built and permanent. Wreathed about this town of 47,500 people, mostly textile mill hands, are the great mills with their tall chimneys that pour their smoke over the place, adding gloom to the monotony. When, twelve years before, Mrs. Lees's husband died, leaving her with a fortune made from cotton weaving, she told her daughters that they were free to leave Oldham if they wished, and that she would go with them. But with that fine sense of social obligation that seems to have developed best in the older communities, they said: "No, we must not go away. We owe it to Oldham to stay here and serve her."

This service has been deeply religious, philanthropic and civic. Over our cup of tea Mrs. Lees told me how she had concluded that she could best serve Oldham by offering herself for election to the city council. "And I was barely elected, for no woman had before done such a thing; it was a new thing."

After the election she gave her principal attention to the children of the big factory town—to their better education and to their play. She and her daughters, believing that even a small slum spot in a community was a center of physical and moral contagion, purchased the spot known in Oldham as "the slum," destroyed it and it its place built a playground with a field house "like those in Chicago," they told me. So practical and sympathetic had Mrs. Lees been with the working people of the town that very soon the citizens began to write letters, as is their habit in England, to the press, urging that the city council choose Mrs. Lees for mayor, "because she cares more for Oldham than does anyone else." This was done, and for two years she was the "lady mayor," receiving the honor of "the freedom of the city," as was shown by the presentation of a gold key in a gold casket. This honor had only once before been conferred, and then to an honored mayor—a man.

The ambition of the lady mayor was, when she went out of office, to leave more free public schools, free playgrounds and more beauty in this ugly place. She, with her daughters and that spirit of social service known all over England—Mary Higgs—had, some time before my visit, organized a "Beautiful Oldham" Society. The children were enlisted and taught to grow flowers, plant trees, keep the streets and yards clean and to believe that a working people's city need not be so ugly. Only that faith that is "the substance of things not seen" could ever have started such an idealistic society, but they were practical, civic æsthetes. They were builders, not just dreamers. They organized a building association—cooperative—for the working people to build homes all together—a new kind of homes in Oldham. The streets were not laid out like a checkerboard, but in graceful lines, with gardens in front and back. They purchased fifty-seven acres on the edge of the town and laid out what they called a "garden suburb." The contrast was so surprising that the old citizens exclaimed, "They are throwing these houses around just about any way." This suburb was so successful that other groups are being planned.

The lady mayor's home is a beautiful old mansion with a large ballroom, no longer used for the family, but given over to the service of the community as a social center. Organizations meet here and have their social gatherings. The school pageants are given in the Lees's grounds every spring.

As Mrs. Lees was elected by the municipal householders' vote of both men and women, and as she herself had the municipal franchise, I asked her if she wanted the whole vote—for parliamentary Typical View in One of the "Ugly" Streets of Oldham, Showing Unpromising Conditions the Lady Mayor Sought to Alleviate offices also. "Oh, yes, of course I do! And after a while I will get it, because the men see how ridiculous it is for me, as mayor, to hold the election funds and to announce the parliamentary vote, and yet, if there should be a tie, I cannot cast the deciding vote. Some man has to be chosen to do this very simple and practical act. You know Englishmen cannot stand being ridiculous, so I believe they will give us the whole vote some day." One could not help thinking that in the meantime Mrs. Lees, her daughters, Mary Higgs and their kind of women were, in a slower but more normal way, preparing for that act of justice and experience that will surely come some day.

This mothering of a municipality of wage earners by this gracious woman is most suggestive to us of this newer country, where a social and civic consciousness is slowly developing. We need the faith of the Beautiful Oldhamites that industrial communities need not be so ugly, that the homes of unskilled workers need not be slums in the germ, as they are so apt to be. The social conscience of the churches ought to organize to build homes that will pay a reasonable interest on the investment. Do it cooperatively if possible, or as a business investment, or as philanthropy at 5 per cent.

Bad housing means a devitalized people; it means ill-health, bad morals and pauperism—and ugliness is brutalizing. America cannot stand up under any such conditions. Our human product must now become our especial care, and demands the same genius that has organized our industrial and commercial business so successfully for financial gain.

Meaning of "Judge Not That Ye Be Not Judged"

That one should always fix his eyes persistently on the good in his fellow men while assiduously ignoring evil blemishes in their character is favorite advice with a certain class of professional optimists who assume to be the special apostles of Christ's injunction, "Judge not that ye be not judged." And undoubtedly their preaching is wholesome and needed as against the pharisaic backbiting to which the "unco guid" are sadly often addicted. But it is preaching which in many cases has lamentable reactions in the lives of the light-hearted preachers themselves. While they plead for men's foibles and frailties to be ignored and for the genial excuses of human charity to be magnified enough to cover all blurs and blots, they are frequently only soliciting easement for their own consciences. Their one-sided standard for judgment, while it might be an admirable generosity toward others, is turned into a mere indulgence for sin toward themselves—a provision for the lusts of the flesh. They would establish a tribunal lenient enough to impose no penalties of disapproval on their own transgressions. When it comes to this, gentle charity is degraded to the character of a blind keeper at the wide gate to the broad way. Surely Jesus never meant that.

Hospitality by Specification

Edward Everett Hale, it is told, was one of the guests at a millionaire's dinner. The millionaire was a free spender, but he wanted full credit for every dollar put out. As the dinner progressed he told his guests what the more expensive dishes had cost. He dwelt especially on the cost of the large and beautiful grapes, each bunch a foot long, each grape bigger than a plum. He told, down to a penny, what he had figured it out that the grapes had cost him apiece. The guests looked annoyed. They ate the expensive grapes charily. But Dr. Hale, unembarrassed, extended his plate and said:

"Would you mind cutting me off about $1.87 worth more, please?"

Superior Assurance

Some salesmen are sufficiently ready witted to meet the claims of their rivals without actually "running them down."

"But the Blank car is guaranteed for life," protested a prospective purchaser to a salesman who hoped to alter his first selection.

"Yes, I know it is," retorted the quick-witted salesman, "but our car is guaranteed for a whole year."

It required several moments for the prospective purchaser to see the point.

A Scotch class was examined in Scripture. "Can any boy or girl here tell me how Noah would be likely to use his time while on the ark?" asked the inspector. One boy timidly showed his hand and replied, "Please, sir, he wad fish." "Well, yes, he might," admitted the inspector. Another little fellow waved his hand excitedly, and said, "Please, he couldna fish vera lang." "What makes you think so, my little man?" "Because there were only twa worms in the ark."—Christian Commonwealth.

Sundry Hints for Church Growth

BY HENRY M. HALL

PRESBYTERIAN churches, of all divisions, are now said to possess about 2,000,000 members and property worth about $200,000,000, an average of a hundred dollars to each member; while the Baptist and Methodist denominations, in the present period, have each about double the number of the members in the Presbyterian fold, although a century or less ago the Presbyterians in the United States outnumbered the other two combined. Presbyterian statistics do not show very rapid advance in membership in recent years; in fact rather the reverse.

Henry M. Hall

Mr. Hall, who is well known to many readers as a contributor to The Continent, and formerly to The Westminster, celebrated his 85th birthday last year. He is a frequent traveler, in America and abroad, and always interests himself in the religious life of the communities he visits.

In my travels from city to city in our land, some minor causes of apathy and spiritual decline in our churches seem palpable to my eyes. Our older Sabbath school scholars seem not generally to attend preaching services and worship, but leave after Sunday school for home or elsewhere on the Sabbath. Furthermore, but few young people are to be seen at our prayer meetings. The Christian Endeavor societies may show many youth, but that should not allure the young people from association with older Christians in the prayer meetings, which are doubtless "the lungs of the church."

Another deterrent to children and youth attending Sabbath church services is the gloom of modern church buildings in the shutting out of the light of heaven by paintings on the windows, the modern craze for the "dim religious light" of mediæval cathedrals. This modern imitation of the centuries old Roman churches by aiming to portray Scripture scenes and stories in the windows of our houses of worship seems to discourage rather than attract the young, who naturally prefer sunlight to gaslight or electricity. Artificial light in our churches by day is not only an extravagant waste of wealth that should go to missions or to poor country churches but it also has a deleterious influence on the eyes of children of both smaller and larger growth. In fact, electricity and "dim religious light" are ruining eyesight in modern city Christian churches. Being at a large city church not long ago one Sunday morning, I found a dark, window-painted interior, with electrical illumination only, although the day was bright and sunny outside.

While at Park Street Congregational church in Boston a year ago I found in operation there a good scheme to draw the older Sunday school boys into church service; i. e., many members volunteer each to select one boy in the Sunday school as a protege or young friend to occupy his pew in church with him every Sunday. This plan works so well that a mutual friendship springs up between boy and man, projected more or less into the daily life of the boy for life. This plan should be adopted in every church thus to train our boys for future interest in church life in manhood. When a minister who by long years of study and mental discipline has fitted himself to preach and teach can talk fifty and a hundred times yearly to young ears, the result must be of great importance to future growth of the Christian church. Preaching spiritual truths early to young minds is like sowing good seed in springtime for future harvests.

Another good plan for a pastor to hold members is by due service besides preaching. Every pastor should devote an hour or two each day in his church study to receiving visits from those of his parishioners who might desire spiritual instruction, comfort or inspiration. The age-long Roman Catholic Church, by the confessional, adopted such a system of holding their members, so at almost any hour of week days their priests are to be found at their posts to administer advice and counsel to overburdened souls. Protestantism has something to learn from this system. Many churches are yearly losing many delinquent, discouraged or backsliding members because they cannot at certain times have personal, confidential and spiritual conversations with their pastors, who are supposed to be caring for the straying lambs and sheep of the Master's fold.

One other suggestion may be in place here: Each young preacher should not only be well grounded in the faith but should be able to speak most distinctly, so that all his utterances may be clearly heard in all parts of the church.

The Boy Who "Would Be Great"

BY PAUL PATTON FARIS

A FUTURE leader of the Christian church in China was before the session of Langyie congregation. Disease and the slovenliness of Chinese poverty had left their marks on him. One eye was obscured by cataract, the other turned sharply inward; he was able to see only from its inner corner.

The child's clothing was scanty and ragged, skin quite discolored by the dust of the streets. As he sat huddled in one corner of a pew, peering sideways at the elders, his was a most unpromising exterior. But within—the light of God was his!

"Your name?" asked the scribe.

"Djang Shu Hung," came from the boy's grinning lips, in an explosive jerk that made the staid men blink with surprise.

The scribe wrote down the name. "Shu Hung," he repeated with a smile. It was an unusual expression, but its meaning was evident. "Aspiring to greatness"—this was the boy who would be great.

"You have already been once examined by the session?"

"Hai! Was I not 15 years old when I was examined before?"

Wherefore, if Shu Hung passed a favorable examination this time he would be eligible to membership. Pastor Djia put the next question: "Shu Hung, do you know how to pray?"

"I know! I say, 'Our Father who art in heaven.' And I also know, 'Whence-came-heaven - and - earth - they - were - created - by God - who - is - God - God - is - the - Lord - of heaven-and-earth——"

"Yes, yes!" The smiling pastor interrupted the flood of quotations from the catechism. "How often do you pray?"

"Three times a day," eagerly the voice went on. "Dawn, breakfast, night."

"And do you know the ten commandments?"

The boy looked startled for an instant, then made a dash on sure ground. "I know, 'Whence - came - heaven - and - earth - they were——' "

Elder Djang broke in with a touch of impatience. "But the ten commandments, do you know them?"

"Never studied them; I can't read."

"Then you must study them, and——"

"Please, elder, won't you teach them to me —now?" The boy cocked his head toward the old man.

Seriously the other went at the task. "The first commandment (it is God who says it) tells me that apart from God there is no God."

"Hai! There is no other!"

"The second, We must neither make idols nor worship them."

"Hai! Those mud gods in the temple are not God. Of course!"

"Third, Don't vainly use the name of God."

"Don't-vainly-use-the-name-of-God. Well!"

"The fourth, Keep the Sabbath. Can you?"

"I can!"

"Will you keep the Sabbath?"

"I will!"

"The fifth, Honor your parents—obey them."

"Obey my parents—I'll do that."

"But think," cautioned the instructor. "If your father tells you to do something bad——"

"I'll not do it. It is wrong to gamble," came the quick assurance.

"Then the sixth, Don't kill. The seventh, Don't commit adultery. The eighth, Don't steal. If a man loses his girdle and you find it, you must not keep it, but——"

"That! It would be wrong."

"The ninth, Don't lie. If a man asks you whether you have seen a thing and you have not, you must not say you have."

"How could I say I had seen it if I had not seen it?"

"And then the tenth, Don't foster a covetous heart."

"Good! Other people's wealth I must not desire!" The boy's garments were in tatters and he ate but one meal a day.

The examination proceeded, disclosing evidence of the candidate's dependence on Jesus for salvation. Again the lad volunteered some information. "Dr. Dien is my uncle. He came home the other day, and he said: 'Why didn't you cut your queue? All New China is cutting queues.' So I went right away and cut mine off."

The pastor saw an opportunity for using the speaker's faith in Christ. "Dr. Dien," the minister began, "his wife is not a church member, and his daughter has not yet sought permission to partake of the evening meal [communion]." She had been baptized in infancy. "When you go home urge them to come before the session."

Out of his seat and down into the aisle dashed the boy. "Sure!" he hurled over his shoulder.

"Not now—come back!" cried the amused pastor. Again the candidate took his seat, but sat on its edge, ready to rush away on the errand.

"Well, brethren," asked the minister, "shall we receive him?"

"I favor it," voted Elder Djang. "I favor it," agreed the second elder. "Favor," said the third voice, adding, "The boy seems to know what he believes."

"Very good. Then tomorrow at 10:30 o'clock, Shu Hung, you will receive baptism."

The crooked face beamed.

"But listen, child," suggested the boy's pastor. "Receiving baptism is a very important affair. See if you cannot find some stockings to wear to the service."

The eager face was overcast. "I have none," he faltered.

"Never mind, then. But get some water—clean water—and wash your face and hands."

"All over—I'll wash me all over!" consented the lad.

"That is good. Now, brother, go home and tell your aunt and cousin to come this afternoon to——"

Back from the middle of the church rang the reply. "I'll tell them!" shouted the boy who "would be great."

THIS AND THAT

MR. CABLE AND HIS WAR HERO

AS WE SAT facing each other on the "gallery" at Biloxi, George W. Cable looked the younger of the two of us, though he had just told me that he lived thirty years in New Orleans before I was born. And he had rounded out the full span of forty before he took his flight from the scene of his earlier romances. The vigor of his step, the keenness of his eyes and the quick incisiveness of his utterances spoke of a man in his prime, who could justly resent in kindly fashion his guest's intimation that he was resting on his laurels.

The famous novelist saw service in the Confederate army; and the quiet enthusiasm with which he discussed that delightful story, "Kinkaid's Battery"—or, rather, the events with which it dealt, for Mr. Cable bores no one with the how and when of his creations—evidenced his keen interest in the tragic period of America's great civil conflict. He is an ardent student of the history of those times, and when some time ago he revisited New Orleans he was fairly bursting with a discovery he had made.

Shortly after his arrival he hurried to a neighborhood in which there resided one of his old-time friends who had worn the gray. As he turned the corner of the street he beheld the man himself just emerging from a garden gate on the opposite side of the thoroughfare.

"Hello, Jim!" he called out. "Say, Jim," he went on enthusiastically as he hastened across with outstretched hand, "do you know I've just learned that you were the man who fired the cannon that gave the signal for the cannonading before Pickett's charge at Gettysburg?"

"Maybe so—I don't recollect," responded "Jim," without excitement. "Where you been all the time, George?"

And "Jim," undisturbed by his having been assigned a definite place in history, proceeded to discuss the more important matter of a possible fishing expedition.

NOT TO THE MANNER BORN

EXPERIENCED travelers find that to secure the greatest possible comforts, or to escape the worst of discomforts, it is frequently necessary to adapt one's self to local conditions, and particularly to cultivate the temporary friendship of such natives as may be specialists in the management of boats, mules and the diversified arrangements which have to do with the procurement of sustenance.

Within the vicinage of one southern resort of the work-weary wights who flee the North for surcease in the spring months there are many aquatic allurements, and there is visible manifold equipment for navigation. But should a day on the water be a matter of sudden decision the visitor is likely to find all the boat owners fully equipped with reasons which, to their more or less great regret, prevent the employment of their services. So it happened that on one particular day the skipper of a dilapidated launch with a wheezy and erratic engine was a personage to be courted.

The parson, who had traveled in "furrin parts" and had dealt with dragomans and couriers, not to speak of ordinary guides, conductors and gondoliers, bravely accepted the task of keeping the skipper in good humor until the excursion had been put beyond question of completion. Three days of life in Dixie had given him a perfect southern accent, and an ability to say "you-all" and "yes, sah" which would have deceived anyone not aware of his descent from Holland via Indiana.

Since the skipper's face was enshrouded in whiskers and his cap was kept close down over his eyes, one could not discover exactly what impression the parson's blandishments and his ready adaptation had made; but the parson in an occasional aside expressed the opinion that "you can get most anything from these southern folks if you just understand them." But there came a time when there were no more asides.

"I certainly do like the way you southern folks handle things so easily," remarked the parson flatteringly to the skipper.

"I ain't no southerner!" snapped the skipper. "I been a wantin' to tell you. I wuz born in Illinoy, brung up in Ioway and come down here from Kokomo, Indiany."

Won the Captaincy Easily

One year when the youngsters of a certain Illinois village met to elect a captain of their baseball team for the coming season, says Lippincott's, it appeared that there were a number of candidates for the post, with more than the usual wrangling.

Youngster after youngster presented his qualifications for the post; and the matter was still undecided when the son of the owner of the ball field stood up. He was a small, snub-nosed lad, with a plentiful supply of freckles.

"I'm going to be captain this year," he announced convincingly, "or else father's old bull is going to be turned into the field."

He was elected unanimously.

THE HOME COUNCIL

Reading Matter for the Isolated

By Lee McCrae

IF YOU LIVE in a town or city and are served each day by a milkman, you have one obligation and opportunity that may not have occurred to you. Has it entered your head, O housewife, that somewhere out in the suburbs there is a whole family—possibly several of them—leading rather hard lives for the sake of your comfort?

"My sister-in-law has moved up on the hill. Can't you supply her?" I asked my milkman one day, thinking to do a double favor.

"I—I—would like to, but it would take lots of time to go 'way up there," he said hesitatingly. "We get up at 3:30 now. I hardly see how we could get up any earlier."

And that man has failed me but once in seven years—the day his sister died. "We get up at 3:30 now" I think every time I hear the rattle of his wagon in the dawn.

It is not just one man who is doing this for us but his whole family. He must have breakfast before starting out on the long trip over the hills to town; the cows are to be milked, the bottles sterilized, filled, covered and packed in crates; the horses must be fed and watered and harnessed. It is a family business, this supplying town customers with fresh milk for their breakfasts.

Oh, yes, "we pay for it" (most of us), but aren't there some obligations that money poorly repays? They are "not expecting anything of us." Of course not, but would we limit ourselves to only the things demanded of us? Kindliness is not in meeting requirements but in going beyond them. The majority of women are kindly and tender-hearted; so it must be thoughtlessness that withholds help where help is due. I am just putting the thought into your busy brains.

Picture the milkman's family away out in the fields where the cattle may have cheap pasturage. Necessarily they are isolated from neighbors and still farther removed from church and school privileges. A narrow life, this, keeping excessively early hours, without any Sabbaths or holidays (not even a Christmas Day), with nothing but drudgery and ceaseless monotony to mark time. Can you find a better object for cheer than the milkman's family?

Give them money? Never! They are proudly independent, and if we are all paying up, they are possibly "making money" and coins would be scorned. Give them instead the very best thing you can put into an isolated home—fresh, interesting literature. In some tactful way find out what children there may be in the family and send through the mails, if you can afford it, the magazine or paper best suited to their years. If direct subscriptions are impossible, everybody can save up children's Sunday school papers until there is a little roll that may be mailed for a few cents.

The Lambs and the Shepherd

A pleasant meadow and a Shepherd's call
Beyond the confines of a crumbling wall.
I and a flock of lambs together stay
Upon this side and wait the coming day;
And when that kindly voice is heard afar
The lambs in gladness leap the wall's slight bar
And run to meet the Shepherd. I am old
And without help I cannot reach the fold,
But lo! he comes to where I, trembling, stand
And reaching o'er the wall he takes my hand,
And now, within the meadow, he and I
Watch for the brightening of the eastern sky.
—William D. Goold in "The Dream Road."

Probably the men of the household will have little time (perhaps little inclination) for reading, but a woman who rises at 3:30, if tempted by an attractive magazine, will perhaps throw herself down occasionally in comfortable abandon to read its pages.

One thing I know from my own childhood on a farm—whatever literature finds it way to the country home is devoured, not skimmed as we skim our good things in town. Would that every splendid sample copy sent out went into a rural mailbox!

Another thing I know. Aid of this sort best comes in a nameless way. Let there be no one to thank. For this reason we suggest Uncle Sam as our "mummest" messenger.

But if there are so many calls on your time and purse that this personal mailing is not feasible, surely it will be no tax to put a pile of recent magazines down on the porch beside the empty bottle awaiting the owner's coming, with a slip of paper telling him to "Take them if you wish."

Probably there are many other ways of sending a bit of cheer from our overfull homes to these lonely places that will suggest themselves to you as you read. You may rest assured any kindly deed will be all the more appreciated by the milkman and his family because it is unexpected.

Did He Guess Right?

The governor of Maine, according to a recent story, was visiting a certain school and was telling the pupils what the people of different states were called.

"Now," he said, "the people from Indiana are called 'Hoosiers,' the people from South Carolina 'Tar Heels,' the people from Michigan we know as 'Michiganders.' Now what little boy or girl can tell me what the people of Maine are called?"

"I know," piped up Johnnie from the corner.

"Well," smiled the governor, "what are we called, then?"

"Maniacs," the youngster replied.

Suspicious of Good Samaritan

A little girl, found weeping in the street, confided to a sympathetic passer-by that she had lost a penny. Search for the missing treasure proving useless, the passer-by produced another penny.

"Oh!" breathed the child, in shocked accents, "and did you have it all the time?"

BITS BY THE WAY

"BUDGET" SYSTEM AT HOME

A man who does not prepare his children for the time when he can no longer take care of them shirks a responsibility. Realizing this, a professor in a New York college has set his hand to the training of his three children, with a view to making them independently able to look out for their own interests.

His family consists of what he considers four and a half members, the "half member" being a little boy for whom he still pays half fare on the trains. The others are himself, his wife and two grown daughters. Every month he divides his income into four and a half parts and turns it over to the members of his family. The boy's half portion is put into the mother's hands to use for his benefit.

Throughout the month, says The Chicago News in an article about the professor's system of family finance, every member contributes an equal share toward the necessary expenses of the household—food, rent, lighting and heating. What remains is spent exactly as each member pleases.

If one of the daughters wants clothes or hats which she has not the money to pay for, she may borrow from another member of the family, but the loan must be repaid—the professor is strict about that. Once he made a loan to a daughter and took as security for its repayment a pink feather boa. This he stored on the top shelf of a closet, and though his daughter had need of it the boa did not come down until the loan had been repaid.

"I never advise any member of the family how to use the money I turn over," says the professor. "They must experiment for themselves, and if they make foolish purchases, why, they will learn all the quicker."

ONLY 868 EMINENT WOMEN

Less than 1,000 women—868, to be exact—in the course of 2,500 years accomplished anything history has recorded, according to Mrs. Cora Sutton Castle, who has recently contributed to the world's learning "A Statistical Study of Eminent Women." She chooses the term "eminent" rather than "great," because eminent may include the notorious as well as the meritorious.

Of these 868 women Mrs. Castle finds Mary Queen of Scots the most eminent, for the encyclopedias, the source of her information, in which all were mentioned bestow upon Mary 607 lines. Indeed, says Mrs. Castle, it is as sovereigns that women have attained their greatest eminence, and to prove her point she cites Mary Stuart, Victoria of England, Elizabeth of England, Catharine II. of Russia, Maria Theresa, Marie Antoinette, Josephine of France, and others. But "although the greatest queens of history achieved higher eminence, literature has given us greater numbers of eminent women than the throne"—337. The "eminent" are classified as follows: Literature 337, marriage 87, religion 64, sovereign 59, actress 56, music 49, birth 39, scholar 20, political influence or ability 19, artist 17, philanthropy 12, tragic fate 11, heroine 10, motherhood 10, reformer 9, dancer 6, immortalized in literature 6, patron of learning 6, beauty 6, education 3, revolutionist 2, misfortune 2, traveler 2, physician 2, fortune teller 1, conjugal devotion 1 and criminal 1.

Women have had more opportunity in literature than in any other line of work, which accounts for the large number of women writers, thinks Mrs. Castle; but judged by the quality of the output of women writers, they seem to be creatures of feeling rather than of reason. Therefore the conclusion is that women have won eminence not in spite of their femininity but because of it.

The group noted for motherhood, one of whom is the mother of Napoleon, attained to eminence through their relations to other great persons.

Only 142 of all these women were unmarried. "It is painful to note, however," grieves Mrs. Castle, "that not all our eminent women were happily married. Eleven and six-tenths per cent of the total number of 781 marriages ended in divorce or separation."

A number of problems regarding the eminence or mediocrity of women Mrs. Castle has still to answer to her satisfaction. "I mean to find out," she declared to a reporter of The New York Tribune, "whether innate inferiority has been the reason for the small number of eminent women, or whether they lag behind men only because civilization has never given them a chance."

Who Knows "Clark's Crow"?

In the Young America department of Th Continent for July 3 the writer speaks of a white bird called "Clark's crow." I have no only handbooks of our eastern birds but thos of the West also, and I can find no referenc to any such bird. Apparently the name is purely local one.

I shall appreciate any information you ca give me regarding this bird, including its scientific name. This may be of interest to othe bird students than myself among your readers

Robert's Cure of an Egg Thief

BY MAUD MORRISON HUEY

"SOMETHING must be done with Belle. I simply won't have an egg-sucking dog around." Mrs. Evans brought her foot down decisively.

"But I don't believe Belle sucks eggs," defended Robert rather weakly. He found it hard to make anyone agree with him in the face of such damaging evidence. There had been three eggs in a nest when Mrs. Evans had gone to the barn. In an hour there were none. Belle had been seen coming from the direction of the barn with her tail between her legs. More than that, Belle was getting unusually sleek and fat.

"I'll just have Bud take her off some place," threatened Mrs. Evans. "An egg-sucking dog may as well be killed first as last."

"But there's ways to break 'em of it, isn't there?" asked the boy miserably. "She hasn't ever had anything—anything done to her yet."

"Well, I haven't got any time to train dogs myself. 'Twouldn't be worth the trouble if she was a good dog, which she isn't. She's nothing but a mongrel pup."

Robert threw a protecting arm around Belle's white throat. It was true, she was nothing but a mongrel, but her big brown eyes were soft and tender, and every spot on her soft fawn body was precious to the boy.

"They shan't do it," he whispered into her ear. "Oh, Belle, you didn't suck 'em, did you? Or if you did eat just one or two, you won't do it again, will you? No one ever told you it was wrong to suck eggs and they shan't kill you—they shan't!" He got up and shook his little fist at the house vehemently. Then he set his head to work to think out a plan for her safety.

"I'll tell you, Belle, I'll fix you a nice place out in the sugar house. I'll take my old coat and make you a bed, and you can stay in there all the time, but just when we're gone some place 'way off where they can't get you. I'll bring out just bushels of bones and biscuits."

But though Robert fixed her up as snug as you please at night, Belle scratched her way out before morning, and three nest eggs were missing from the chicken house. He tried leading her around wherever he went, even slipping her up the back stairs to bed with him at night; but his mother soon caught him at that and put a stop to it. She took the case to higher court, Robert's father.

"The boy is just wasting his whole time fooling with that dog," she complained. "He even takes her up to bed, and I won't have that—a dirty dog messing up my carpets. I'm convinced she sucks eggs, and if she does you can just have Bud take her out and kill her."

"But give me one chance! Give me a chance to break 'er of it!" wailed Robert. "Nobody ever tried to break 'er!"

"Well, supposing we give him one week to break the dog of sucking eggs," suggested the father.

After the morning chores were done Robert took an egg out of the egg basket and a box of cayenne pepper and a tin cup and went out to the tool house. He punched a hole the size of a pea in one end of the egg, and a tiny hole in the other end, then putting his mouth to the tiny hole he blew the greater part of the contents into the cup. This he sprinkled generously with the pepper, then beat it up well with a rusty nail. Then he fished a package of court plaster out of his pocket and carefully cutting off a piece he pasted it over the smaller hole in the shell. Rolling a piece of paper quite small at one end, he made a funnel that fitted into the larger hole, and through this he poured the egg back, sealing this hole also with court plaster. After the shall had been carefully washed it looked quite the same as ever, and he started for the barn with it.

Belle came bounding after him as usual, barking and wagging her tail. Robert stopped and threw his arms about her guiltily. "I hate to do it, you know I do, Belle! But I just have to break you of sucking eggs!"

Robert selected the nest most frequently robbed, and taking out the good egg, slipped the doctored egg in its place.

The next morning the nest was empty. Belle was gone, too. Though Robert whistled and whistled, he heard no answering bark, and he was filled with remorse. Perhaps so much pepper had killed her.

Bud came along about noon, but he did not stay long. He seemed to be in a great hurry. Something in his manner aroused Robert's suspicions. He had felt unfriendly toward Bud, anyhow, since he had been selected to dispose of Belle when the time came. He stepped out of the shadow of the barn and began to follow the older boy's trail, far enough behind so he couldn't be seen.

Miss Amer-i-can

BY RUTH HALL JOHNSTON

Who is this? O-Suki-San?
Fairest maid in all Japan?
With her socks and sandals white
And her soft kimono bright
And her gorgeous parasol and fan?

You small fraud! O-Suki-San?
No, you never saw Japan!
For your curls of yellow hue
And your eyes of sparkling blue
Say, "We're every bit Amer-i-can!"

At the turn in the road two other boys joined Bud, and then all three struck off across the fields, following a faint path. This, Robert knew, led to the creek, and to a small cave under the hill, where the older boys had one time had a camp. Robert was not mistaken in his guess that this was their destination.

Giving them plenty of time to enter, he crept around to the ledge above, where he knew there was a small crevice in the rocks through which he might see what was going on below. Lying flat on his stomach, he watched and listened.

"Guess we must have a dozen apiece, all right!" Bud chuckled.

"Got a match, boys?" One of the others gathered some dry sticks and leaves. "Hard boiled eggs, eh?" The third boy took the old kettle that had served on many a camping expedition and went down to the creek for water. Robert lay as still as a mouse among the bushes above.

They weren't long building the fire and cooking the eggs, then right merrily they began to eat.

"Ever taste eggs as good as these?" asked Bud as he reached for a second one. "Done just to a turn! Whew! What ails this one? Jee-im-eny but it's hot! Wow! Wow! Wow!" He put his hands to his mouth and danced about wildly. "Water, boys!" he gasped "Water!"

Robert had all he could do to keep from laughing outright. Something soft and cool touched his hand, and there was Belle all doubled up with contrition because she had run away, her sides scratched with the brush that had torn at her in her mad chase for a rabbit.

"Sh-h, Belle! Come on, let's get out of here!" Robert whispered into her ear. "This is no place for us," and together they fled noiselessly away.

"Seems like that dose cured Belle of sucking eggs, all right," Mrs. Evans remarked a few days later. "I haven't missed an egg since. You must have fixed up a good one."

"I fixed up a dose that cured the egg thief, all right," said Robert, as he reached down slyly to pet Belle under the table.

Are You Remembering the Birds?

During the long, hot, dusty days that are still here I wonder how many boys and girls are remembering that the little birds need water? In our towns and cities they may suffer unless water is provided for them.

If you haven't thought about it before, it is not too late now. Any shallow pan or dish will do. Fill it full and keep it so all day, that the birds may come and drink. You will be surprised how quickly they will tell each other where the water is placed and how many will come for it, and how often.

I place two vessels for them, one for drinking and one for bathing. How I love to see them standing, their little toes touching the water, while they gracefully dip the water with their little bills! And then their bathing. You will be rewarded for all your trouble when you see them plunge into the water. How they whip and flutter and splash! Then they get into the warm sunshine to dry their clothes.

I can tell you that often, after Mrs. Robin takes her bath, I have to go and empty the bathtub and fill it with clean water. You see, she comes in from the garden or dusty roadside, and never uses the brush, but just jumps in as she is. Yet I cannot scold her, for she seems to get so much enjoyment out of it.

I trust this little note may cause many of you to place water for the birds. If you do, they will repay you well with many a graceful nod and motion. ALISON HUNTER.

Grammar Too Much for Johnnie

Johnnie's teacher had tried in vain to impress upon his mind that it is incorrect to say "have went." As a last resort she told him to remain after school and write upon the blackboard 100 times the words "I have gone."

When after much effort the laborious task was completed Johnnie waited for the teacher, who had left the room, to return. Finally in desperation he wrote beneath his completed task:

"Miss Smith, I have wrote 'I have gone' 100 times and have went home."

Passing Along the Obligation

"Here is an apple, Sam," said his mother. "Divide it with your sister and be generous."

"How shall I be generous, mamma?" asked Sam, grasping the apple.

"Why, always give the larger part to the other person, my child."

Sam thought a few moments in silence. Then he handed little sister the apple.

"Here, Ethel, you heard what mamma said. You divide it, 'stead of me."

What About "Betty and Benjy"?

DEAR YOUNG AMERICA: Of course you are remembering that the "Betty and Benjy" stories must be at The Continent office by Sept 1, and are hastening to complete them for the editor. Also, that, now that your long holiday is nearing its close, she will be looking for those vacation stories of yours sometime between now and Oct. 14. Better write them before the busy school days begin again.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

August 31—Israel at Mount Sinai

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Exodus 19; Hebrews 12:18-24. Golden Text, Hebrews 12:28: Let us have grace, whereby we may offer service well-pleasing to God with reverence and awe.

Through all his varied experiences Moses had learned to trust God, and that trust was the real secret of his power. Faith with him was not a theory but an adaptation. Whether confronted by the desert or by the sea, he ever appealed to the one Source of strength. The scene at Horeb was but a repetition of the one in the desert. Once more the people cried for water and murmured against their leader. The fact that God was their helper and not Moses they could not for some reason learn. Chiding Moses is a poor substitute for an appeal to God. Moses was commanded to go before the people and in the presence of the elders to smite the rock. It was an object lesson of the Power upon whom they must depend. The origin of their contention was lack of faith. The question was not so much "What shall we drink?" as "Is the Lord with us or not?" But the smitten rock became a fountain and the people drank, only to forget as they had done before. It is unfortunate when "Meribah," or "strife," becomes associated with the memory of any blessing.

The Children of Israel Strive Against the Amalekites

But contention was not the only enemy that confronted Israel. The Amalekites, one of the fiercest tribes of the country, threw themselves across their way and offered battle. Moses was prepared for this emergency by a military training in Egypt. The Jewish historian writes of this battle with great fullness. The night previous the lawgiver is said to have taken counsel with the chief men of the tribes and assigned to them their places. The young men were enjoined to obey their leaders, and the women and children were given over to the protection of a special detail of picked men. Their weapons were of every conceivable kind. Some they had brought from Egypt and some had once belonged to the host at the bottom of the sea. Joshua was made the leader. He was a young man and his genius was perhaps known only to Moses. The historian also says that when Moses "had thus animated the army, both by his words and works, he returned to the mountain and committed all to God and to Joshua." With him were Aaron and Hur, the latter supposed to be Miriam's husband.

Rod of Moses Becomes the Flag of Israel

The battle on the morrow opened with great fierceness. Moses watched it from the hill, in sight of the army below. The rod held in his outstretched hand became the flag of Israel. That old man of over 80 years, standing on the crest of the hill, and with his own tired hands upholding the standard of his country, is one of the grandest pictures in all history. When the rod rose or fell, the spirit of the army rose or fell with it. His arms weakened, but Aaron and Hur came to his support. All day long these Israelites struggled and fought and killed. Their battle axes and bludgeons smote like flails of iron. Josephus says that it was a battle won by main strength. Every Israelite fought with the strength of ten. And there until the going down of the sun Moses upheld his rod, the sign of Jehovah's presence. The battlefield was marked by an altar, Jehovah-nissi—"Jehovah is my banner." Truth ever seeks some sign through which to express itself. Our banner is the Word, and as it rises or falls may we expect victory or defeat.

For two months Moses had lived at the center of the whirlwind, but rest is the morrow of work. He was near his old haunts in Midian, and Jethro, his father-in-law, with Moses' wife and two sons, came to see him. Their reception was most cordial and together they talked over the strange happenings since their separation. Moses made a banquet in their honor, and received wise counsel from Jethro. Then each went back to his own.

We are now approaching the most important event that ever came into the life of Moses or the history of Israel—the giving of the law. The distance from Rephidim to the wilderness of Sinai was not far, and there, we are told, he camped before the mount. Alone Moses descended the mountain and there God met him and commanded him what to say to the people below. They were to be reminded that he had lifted them out of their bondage and borne them as on eagles' wings unto himself. Moreover, if they would obey his voice and keep his covenants, he would make them a peculiar treasure unto him from among all the people of the earth. Moses returned and declared to the elders all that he had heard. The message was communicated to the people. Their response must have sounded through the cliffs and glens of the mountains like the voice of seven seas. "And all the people answered together, and said, All that Jehovah hath spoken we will do." And Moses went back and "told the words of the people unto Jehovah."

God Impresses Upon Israel the Sanctity of His Message

For two days they were to sanctify themselves against the coming of God. Hands were to be washed and hearts made pure through penitence for sin. God they had known as a power. The sea had fled at his approach and his judgments had turned the light into darkness, but within two days he was to come nearer than ever before. And so they waited. The third day broke with the crash of thunder. Again the Lord summoned Moses to the top of the mountain and bade him go back to the people, lest they break through to the mount and die. God was about to visit the earth and all nature arose to greet him. But the demonstration had a purpose in it. The Messenger would impress the people with the sanctity of the message. It was the beginning of a new civilization. The miracle at Sinai was the written revelation of God.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—The nation is withdrawn from distracting contact and commonplace duties to listen reverently to the voice of Jehovah. In this impressive isolation God reminds the people of his powerful interference on their behalf, promises them special favors for the future and amid startling phenomena delivers the law.

We are likely to think of "the wilderness of Sinai" as having been always as remote from the great life of the world as it is now. But modern explorations made it clear that the mountains of Arabia were early known for their deposits of minerals and gems and that these mines were worked by the Egyptians long before the era of Moses. Many of the smoother rocks have been used to record historic events and national movements, and these inscriptions have an important bearing upon questions of chronology. Moses was following a route as well known to his contemporaries as the "Oregon trail," leading across the great prairies and over the lofty ranges, was known to our fathers if not us us.

The "mount of the law" appears to have been the traditional "Jebel Mousa," or mountain of Moses, which rises amid surrounding peaks to a height of 7,363 feet above the sea.

The scene about the mountain has been described by the eminent traveler and Semitic scholar, Mrs. Lewis, as "a vivid contrast of color in the green waving treetops and the dark, frowning cliffs standing out against a clear, sapphire sky."

Ears Closed to Other Voices Hear Voice of God

Verses 1-2—After their long halt, exulting in their first victory, they advanced deeper into the mountain ranges, they knew not whither. They knew only that it was for some great end, some solemn disclosure, such as they had never before witnessed. Onward they went, through winding valley, and under high cliff, and over rugged pass, and through gigantic forms on which the marks of creation even now seem fresh and powerful; and at last, through all the surrounding valleys, the whole body of people were assembled. On their right hand and on their left rose long successions of lofty rocks, forming a vast avenue like the approaches they had seen leading to the Egyptian temples between colossal figures of men and gods. At the end of this broad avenue, rising immediately out of the level of the plain on which they were encamped, towered the massive cliffs of Sinai like the huge altar of some natural temple, encircled by peaks of every shape and height, the natural pyramids of the desert. In this sanctuary, secluded from all earthy things, they waited for the revelation of God.—Dean Stanley.

"Use sometimes to be alone" is the wise spiritual counsel of George Herbert. What we are to proclaim from the housetops comes to us in the whispered, individual communion with God (Matt. 10:27). The minister who has no "little sanctuary" in which to meet God will have no message to deliver to his people in the great temple, and the Sunday school teacher who has no valley of encampment will have no mount of revelation.

Spirit of Obedience Created Before Law Is Given

Verses 3-4—Parents sometimes foolishly, sometimes wickedly, demand a child's obedience without reason or explanation. God does not. He prefaces the giving of the law, eternally right as it is, with the recalling of recent providences. He sends a greeting to the "house of Jacob, the children of Israel," reminding them of his direct interposition in their behalf. He would rest their obedience not simply upon eternal right but upon personal thankfulness. "The spirit of obedience is created," says Joseph Parker, "before the law is given."

As an eagle easily bears its young on its mighty pinions over rivers and mountains and deserts and dangers which it would be impossible for them to overcome of themselves, so God had delivered the Israelites. It would have been impossible for them to have done it themselves. Having learned how good it was to trust him, they may well trust him for days to come.—Peloubet.

Verse 5—Jehovah goes farther and adds promises for the future to remembrances of the past. Among all the people of the earth the children of Israel are to be a peculiar people under the direct protection and guidance of the Almighty. A good neighbor to his fellow citizens may well be more to his own family. Benevolence does not forbid love to our own.

Verse 6—In the Orient as in the Roman Church of mediæval times, the priest was exempt from many of the burdens and restrictions which weighed down upon or hampered the layman. Even in free and modern America the minister of religion is exempt from certain duties which must be discharged by the lay citizen, such as jury service and, in some states, military drill. The promise was that the priest's privileges should be extended to the whole nation. They should be in a special manner and high degree under the personal protection of Jehovah. And, looking over their centuries of history, Dean Milman says "the Jew is the miracle of history," so essentially does his history differ from that of any other nation.

Verse 16—The law of God does not issue from heated debates in tumultuous legislative chambers, itself marked by passion and stained by dirty hands. No finer conception of the origin of law was ever given than we have here—a perfect sky, a glorious height, a mysterious cloud and reverberations under which the earth trembled.

Verse 17—To create a still deeper impression, the nation is summoned to stand before God and await the revelation of that fundamental law which is to be its constitution.

Verses 18-21—An exhibition of power and splendor followed. But the environment even then could not equal the grandeur of the occasion. That law stands to this day in its majesty and strength, the foundation of all modern civilization. The fundamental principles of the decalogue are the foundation courses in all Anglo-Saxon constitutional law. Amid all the changes of human life not one of these laws has grown obsolete and no new one has been needed. They have not been subject to repeal; they have not been outgrown; they have needed no violent twisting to meet all our wants. It was fit that they should be delivered amid such scenes as here described.

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning August 24, 1913

Topic—The laborers in the vineyard. Matthew 20:1-16.

This parable has remained a stumblingblock in the way of many devout Christians, who cannot see the justice of the transaction. Why should men who had worked only one hour receive the same pay as men who had worked twelve hours and borne the burden of the day and the scorching wind? We rebel against a God who acts according to no other rule than that it is lawful for him to do as he will with his own. We rebel against the law of a universe where favoritism governs the distribution of rewards, either in this world or in that which is to come.

It is indeed true that God controls all men and all the rewards of men. And this teaching remains a permanent part of the meaning of this parable. But it is not its prominent teaching. Nor shall we have to search long before we find another principle more in harmony with our conceptions of the justice of God. This principle is that in estimating the amount of reward to be paid to any man at the close of the day, God takes account not only of the quantity of the service rendered by his servants but also of the quality.

Preceding the utterance of this parable is the charge to the rich young man who asked Jesus what he should do to inherit eternal life: "If thou wouldst be perfect, go, sell that which thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me."

Peter has been listening eagerly. He thinks he perceives how this word of Jesus may be turned to his own advantage. While Jesus continues speaking to the company, he is engaged in working out his idea. Then he bluntly questions Jesus: "Lo, we have left all, and followed thee; what then shall we have?" And Christ meets him also upon his own ground. Peter, and the rest of the twelve, would sit upon twelve throne, judging the twelve tribes of Israel. They would receive an hundredfold for every self-surrender, and inherit life eternal. So far all goes entirely according to Peter's desire. Then comes the crack of the lash: "But many shall be last that are first; and first that are last."

The parable of the laborers is a parable addressed to those who serve their Lord for hire, and not for love. Peter's question proved that he needed the teaching. The hireling everywhere needs it.

The laborers who made their engagements early in the morning were in a position to drive a good bargain. They stood up boldly in the marketplace and sold their labor to the highest bidder. Their price was a shilling a day. They asked no favors. They sold their labor voluntarily for the highest possible price.

But it was far otherwise, when the precious hours of the early morning were gone. The tardy laborers were standing in the marketplace, still unhired. They were in no position to drive a bargain for a shilling a day—or for any price. And when the owner of the vineyard said to them, "Go ye also into the vineyard, and whatsoever is right I will give you," they were very willing to go, without making any stipulation as to the precise amount. They were content to trust their master to fix the terms.

If this was true of those who were engaged at the third hour, it was increasingly true of those who entered the vineyard at the sixth hour and the ninth hour. Most of all was it true of those who still stood in the marketplace at the eleventh hour. They had despised all earlier offers of work, and had failed to improve all earlier opportunities. Now there was only an hour to sundown. They could not hope to do much in this brief period of time, but they might do something. And in return perhaps their master would give them an evening meal and the privilege of lying with the other servants by the winevat for the night. Of wages they dared not speak.

But when the time of payment came the master began with those who had worked only one hour and gave them each a shilling. They were filled with gratitude for this reward, which exceeded their utmost expectation. But the early comers, as well as the tardy ones, received each of them a shilling.

Then those who had worked twelve hours, although they had received just what they had been promised, objected to being placed on a footing of equality with those who had been late in beginning. There was a grave danger lest Peter, who was disposed to bargain with his master for his emolument, should at length find himself classified with those servants who had entered the service of Christ at the first, but in the distribution of rewards were honored last.

The parable is a lesson against the hireling spirit, the spirit of bargaining with Christ for so much reward in return for so much service. Such a spirit can only regard the blessings of the kingdom in a gross, materialistic way. It is the spirit that wants to make righteousness pay that looks upon godliness as a way of gain. With the man who drives a bargain for his services the Master deals strictly according to agreement. No man can spend his whole life carefully calculating what is to his own advantage and expect to meet a reward of gratitude at the close.

Over against the spirit of bargaining he commends the spirit of trustful acquiescence in his call, the spirit of patient submission to his disposal of his rewards. He commends the service that is not determined by small considerations of prudential wisdom, but is moved and kindled by the self-surrender of the soul.

Christ does not want grudging service; he does want whole-hearted, enthusiastic service. He does not want the service of laborers who are simply trying to be fair with him, and give him his due. He does want the service of laborers whose hearts are buoyant with love and whose hands and feet move swiftly, because they are in the service of their Lord. The servants whom he most of all desires are not those who are actuated by a sense of justice but those who are inspired by pure devotion, and thus do justice.

Of course the Master does not imply that only those servants who are late in coming are inspired by devotion, while those who come early are incited by the love of gain. No such meaning as this can properly be drawn from his words. He simply uses these two types to illustrate the superior worth of the service of the heart. He regards one hour of work done in the spirit of devotion as being worth twelve hours of work done for wages.

The ideal service must be ever that of the man who begins early to do God's will, who employs the fresh morning hours in the freedom and gladness of the vintage, who spends the noonday of his vigorous manhood in bearing the burden of the day and the scorching wind, who returns in the evening with his shoulders bowed beneath the load of the harvest, tired out indeed, and yet with a song on his lips and gladness in his heart. To work all day, and to work devotedly, must ever be the source of gladness for the Master and the servant.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

August 31, 1913

THINGS THAT MAN CANNOT DO

Topic — Missionary essentials, home and abroad. II. Prayer. Ephesians 6:10-20.

The Standard Oil Company is selling its wares all over the earth. Its success is one of the wonders of modern commerce. It has supplanted the ancient water jar of Asia by the five-gallon tin can. The immemorial irrigation water lift along the Tigris and the Euphrates rivers, by animal power, is giving way to the oil pump. Beholding the achievements of a mighty corporation like this, in creating and directing a successful, worldwide enterprise, many missionary speakers have suggested that the propaganda of Christianity could be carried on in the same way. The idea is perhaps a natural one. But let no man think that any business concern could, by business methods, evangelize the world. No greater heresy could lodge in the minds of men. The Christianization of mankind is a spiritual process, to be effected by spiritual means. Humanly speaking, man cannot do it. The task is one for the forces of the divine Spirit. Only Spirit-filled men, employing spiritual agencies, can make over this old earth in its deepest religious convictions.

"With prayer, or not at all," was the slogan of the recent simultaneous every-member canvass of the United Presbyterian and German Reformed Churches.

Christian progress abroad is dependent upon Christian prayer at home.

The more closely one studies his land and times the more intelligent becomes his conviction that the need of all needs in our day, with respect to religion, is for a new sense of spiritual verity and values on the part of church and people. There is no lack of machinery; we are fairly submerged beneath a bewildering array of methods. No new agencies are needed, we have too many already. We are ingenious and inventive and modernized to the minute. In all the externals of religious propaganda we are abundantly equipped. Still the report comes of arid, sterile fields and of listless laborers. The deep lack of our day is for a soul-burdened spirituality. We need more praying Christians. We must have men and women agonizing for the outpouring of spiritual plenishing. Not more conventions but more Christians going apart alone to entreat God in behalf of the world is our want. The topic has the right word—"essential"; prayer is absolutely essential to Christian progress. The church may win without money, without boards and without equipment; but she can only fail if there is not vital, ceaseless prayer in her heart of hearts.

Phillips Brooks uttered one of the really great truths about prayer when he said, "Prayer is not the conquering of God's reluctance, but the taking hold of God's willingness."

Kingdom pray-ers make kingdom Christians. Christ wrote into his prescription for prayer the formula "Thy kingdom come." To pray for the kingdom, with sincerity and intelligence, is to grow up to kingdom stature, being lifted out of the pettiness, meanness and sordidness of the small soul. Our prayers for the salvation of the world may be the salvation of ourselves.

Ding Li Mai, a Chinese evangelist who has led hundreds of Chinese students to devote themselves to the work of the Christian ministry, has a prayer life so real that he spends whole nights on his knees. He has a list of more than a thousand persons for whom he prays by name. The reason he has power in gospel work is that he has power with God.

When thou prayest, rather let thy heart be without words, than thy words without heart. —Bunyan.

Prayer is not a performance but a pleading. Not the most beautiful prayers, but those which are most freighted with sincerity and faith, win the favor of the Highest. A prayer may have all the literary form of a masterpiece, and yet be as futile as the stamped prayer inside a Tibetan prayer wheel.

Only the tuned violin can make music; and only the life in harmony with God can win victories for him. There is no other power for spiritual work except spiritual power.

NEW BOOKS

Two Books of Presbyterian Interest

Southern Presbyterian Leaders, by Henry Alexander White. Professor White has prepared a volume which may well take its place with the best of the not too abundant books dealing with American Presbyterian history. Properly, the development of Presbyterianism is traced in the careers of individuals—Makemie, Craig, Blair, Brown, Roan, Davies, McAden, Craighead, the southern Witherspoon, Campbell, Simpson, Richardson, Caldwell, Doak, Graham, Alexander, Waddell, Hoge, Rice, Baxter, Leland, Plumer, Thornwell, and many others of the older time, with Palmer, Dabney, Wilson, Stuart Robinson, and other later and equally vigorous leaders of the faith moving through the pages. In the South as elsewhere in America Presbyterianism was propagated mainly by the Scotch-Irish, some of them near kin in the early days to other Scotch-Irish who planted themselves in the North. It is notable, too, that Presbyterianism in those times did not hold itself in the comparative comfort and safety of the cities and villages, but had its lustiest beginnings in remote regions where the war cry of the savage was still to be heard. Through the storm of the revolution and the devastation and distress of civil war the product of such a planting was bound to persist. One may only find fault with Dr. White that he somehow implies a limiting to the people of one church and one section of the appreciation in which these men and their good deeds are to be held. Nothing would be lost in presenting such a theme to an audience representing all Presbyterianism. Certainly those of the faith everywhere will find in Dr. White's book much that is good for them to know. [Neale Publishing Company, New York.

Presbyterian Law and Usage, by Benjamin F. Bittinger. With an appendix by William Henry Roberts. This excellent manual of Presbyterianism appears now in its first revision since 1904, the appendix by Dr. Roberts including the deliverances and other actions of the Assembly of 1912 affecting procedure. To ministers and church officers the book is well-nigh indispensable. The analytical index leads to the section applying to every contingency covered by the laws and rulings of the church. [Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia. $1 postpaid.

Religion and Philosophy

The Heidelberg Catechism, by George W. Richards. This volume represents studies stimulated by the 350th anniversary of the publication of the catechism which has been repeatedly pronounced by parties both interested and disinterested to be the most genial and practical of all the Calvinistic symbols. It covers questions of historical interest, such as the antecedents out of which the Heidelberg document grew, the circumstances in the reformation period which called for its construction, the personnel of its eminent framers and the controversies preceding and following its issuance. Dr. Richards also discusses the doctrinal content of the catechism, comparing its system with those of other similar documents and with modern theological thinking. The spirit and attitude of the author in the discussion of these matters reveal the theologian of the sound as well as of the open mind, progressive and yet with a keen sense of historic continuity. [Publication Board of the Reformed Church U. S., Philadelphia.

Some Influences in Modern Philosophic Thought, by Arthur Twining Hadley. Philosophy, as the subject is understood nowadays, is a many-sided subject. It has a psychological, a metaphysical and a sociological approach. President Hadley has been a specialist, one might even say an expert, in social science and it is not to be wondered at that in these lectures he treats the subject not from the standpoint of the pure philosopher or psychologist but from that of the sociologist. Instead of tracing the philosophical systems of the last few generations in their natural unfolding he affiliates them with the political and social conditions within which they arose, and endeavors to help men toward the better understanding of their power over the mind. [University Press, New Haven.

Freedom and Authority in Religion, by E. Y. Mullins. In this well written volume the president of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary (Louisville) attacks a problem of the most vital importance in the field of the philosophy of religion. Dr. Mullins's main concern seems to be to show that authority and freedom are not contradictories but rather interdependent and mutually supplementary realities. He recognizes the fact that authority has been so represented on one side (as, for instance, by the Roman Catholic Church) as to nullify freedom, and again by ultra-radical thinkers freedom has been so defined as to invalidate the idea of authority. In this analysis of the situation Dr. Mullins is unquestionably right; and the reader will find much to clear his mind so far as the diagnosis is concerned. When, however, he comes to expound his own view, Dr. Mullins scarcely satisfies the unbiased inquirer. To begin with, his notion of authority strikes one as peculiar. Authority, he seems to think, is not inconsistent with fallibility and error. Doubtless much assumed authority is of this kind. But this is scarcely the authority that the Roman Catholic Church and theologians of the type of Sabatier are disputing about. With this failure to grasp the real nature of authority Dr. Mullins misses the mark all along the line. His polemic against the "liberal" school, as he calls it, loses its point and his defense of the conservative positions on biblical inspiration becomes a mere display of dialectics. This is not saying, of course, that the book is not full of acute thinking and valuable suggestions. [American Baptist Publication Society, Philadelphia. $1.50.

Spiritual Law in Natural Fact, by J. C. Armstrong. Though the title of this little book seems to reverse the order of thought presented in the once famous treatise by Henry Drummond on "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," the constructive idea underlying it is identical with that of the earlier book. Dr. Armstrong pleads against the separation of the material and spiritual spheres in such a way as to make the one independent of the other, and in a series of illustrations shows how interlocked they are with one another and how impossible it is to understand either without the help of the other. The preacher in particular will find the volume suggestive and helpful. [Griffith and Rowland Press, Philadelphia. 50 cents net.

Sermons and Addresses

Sermons and Addresses and Things Learned by Living, by John Bascom. For more than sixty years Professor Bascom was an indefatigable producer of books on a wide variety of topics. These latest additions to the list are characterized by vigor of thought and clearness of expression. Of special interest is the volume "Things Learned by Living," in which the writer seeks to gather lessons brought by the experience of an unusually long, rich and full life, spent in intellectual and spiritual endeavor and inspiring in its virility. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Each $1.25 net.

The Sermon: Its Construction and Delivery, by David James Burrell. Dr. Burrell's conspicuous success as a preacher gives interest to a work on homiletics which comes from his pen, and yet it is only the truth to say that this book adds nothing to that which may be found in the standard works on preaching, from which he draws freely for quotations enforcing his own views. The lesson seems to be that if a man has in him the power to preach, the time-tested methods will effectively develop it. Dr. Burrell leans to conservatism in his theological views, and constantly counsels the preaching of the gospel along those lines. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Chats with Children of the Church, by James M. Farrar, is a small volume into which the author has gathered the "children's sermons" first published by him in The Christian Herald. No one of these sermons will take more than ten or twelve minutes in the reading, but they will stay by the growing boy or girl, and produce fruit long years afterwards. The themes are arranged to march with the seasons and so find lessons in the objects before the eyes of the youthful auditors. [Funk and Wagnalls, New York. $1.20 net.

The Recovery of the Ancient Orient, by Robert William Rogers. This is the Phi Beta Kappa commencement address at Allegheny College, 1912, and is the product of the most brilliant archæological scholar in the Methodist Church. It is a rapid but comprehensive survey of the development of archæology in Egypt and Mesopotamia, giving the dates and the names of the greatest explorers woven into an interesting tale. [Eaton and Mains, New York. 25 cents.

Problems of Social Betterment

Socialism and Democracy in Europe, by Samuel P. Orth. Everyone who is afraid of socialism should read these pages of actual observation of the socialistic trend. The author has made a very thorough study of socialism as that gospel is actually practiced in France, Belgium, Germany and England. The results there are everything that the older tooth and nail opponents of socialism did not expect. Contact with the actual has robbed these socialists of their revolutionary fervor; they have cast aside such outworn doctrines as class war and free love, they have recognized that education and not artificial remodeling is the key to the regeneration of society, and they are hard at work on such gradual reforms as may be best accomplished here and now. And, on the other hand, their mingling with it has broadened the traditional democracy, made it social where it was before political and forced legislators to think in terms of child welfare where before they thought in terms of diplomatic strategy. So while the author sees no Utopia ahead; while he sees no easy solutions to age-long problems, he regards socialism as a factor of educative value and his book is a distinctively hopeful one as regards the great problem of the day—the future of democracy. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Commercialized Prostitution in New York City, by George J. Kneeland, is the first of four books to be issued by the bureau of social service, dealing with the whole problem of social vice. It contains the results of months of investigation in the houses and streets of the city, and is an honest effort to let in curative light. As a mere narrative of facts it would be appalling, but the hands which have let in the light are busily setting the forces of correction at work. Miss Katherine Bement Davis, superintendent of the state reformatory for women, contributes an analysis of the records already secured there, with some surprising results. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., writes the introduction. The book is not written to satisfy prurient curiosity, and will be useful to all social workers. All its illustrations are referred to under key numbers, in order to insure its authoritative accuracy. [Century Company, New York. $1.30 net.

European Cities at Work, by Frederic C. Howe. It is only within the last few years that Americans have appreciated the possibilities of the city, for, as Dr. Howe remarks, the city has grown more rapidly than has our city sense. The result is that cities on the other side of the Atlantic are far ahead of us, says Dr. Howe, in consciously promoting comfort convenience, happiness, life. It is well worth the while of any citizen to make a study with Dr. Howe of the things that distinguish European cities from our own. Berlin, Frankfort, Hamburg, Dusseldorf, Dresden, Munich, Vienna and Brussels, Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool and London all have something to teach us as to how a city should be governed and what it can do for the social and industrial life of its citizens. A particularly interesting and instructive chapter makes a comparison of the American and European city—the difference in point of view, notably the highly developed community sense possessed by European cities, where the rights of the public are held superior to the rights of the individual. In continental cities it is not permissible for one man to erect an utterly inharmonious flat building alongside a beautiful home, or for another to build a garage or a saloon in the heart of a residence district. Individual license does not run riot; cities are built as a unit. There are several pictures to show town planning, garden cities, ideal railway stations and other works of municipal art, toward which, let us hope, America is working. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.75 net.

Principles of Prussian Administration, by Herman Gerlach James. The American idea of administration is changing. This is shown in the adoption of the commission form of government by cities, and in the employment of business managers with almost absolute power by small towns. In the state, commissions have been created in increasing number with an increasing degree of power over matters which directly affect the people. Into this flux of political ideas comes this book, a dispassionate statement of the methods of administering law in Prussia, presented in a thoroughly scholarly way. The legislator, student or voter who would be informed of the history of administrative law in a state which has been taken as a model in many things will welcome this volume. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Social Welfare in New Zealand, by H. H. Lusk, reviews the great social and political experiment that has been in operation for many years in that country, giving special attention to the progressive social legislation during the last twenty years. New Zealand, though but a small island, has long stood in the front rank as the exponent of progressive civilization. This volume, with its carefully arranged facts and figures, is a veritable compendium of information; and its reliability is guaranteed by the fact that for half a century the author has been intimately connected with public affairs in the New Zealand government. [Sturgis and Walton Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Value of Organized Speculation, by Harrison H. Brace, endeavors to present both the advantages and the disadvantages of speculation as a social and economical factor in business. To do this, Mr. Brace goes over the entire question of prices, values, markets, etc. On the whole he justifies speculation, acknowledging, however, that it has some very serious evil features. The book probably is as good a plea as can be formulated in favor of organized speculation. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.50 net.

Socialism: Its Strength, Weakness, Problems and Future, by Alfred Raymond Johns. Most of this small volume is devoted to carrying the dreams of socialists to absurd conclusions, and yet in discussing the future of the movement the author commends its advocacy of the socialization of control of railways, mines, telephone and telegraph. The book puts into logical form the various socialist doctrines and a reply thereto. [Methodist Book Concern, New York. 50 cents net.

The Constructive Quarterly

The Constructive Quarterly, edited by Silas McBee, promises in some respects to surpass the best of other similar publications as a medium for the discussion of questions of religious and ecclesiastical interest. The second number of the quarterly contains articles by contributors from Scotland, Canada, England, Russia, France and the United States—surely a sufficiently wide representation of international Christendom for one number. The ecclesiastical organizations for which these contributors speak (of course unofficially) are no less diversified. We note among them the Greek Orthodox Church, the Roman Catholic Church, both the Anglican and American Episcopacy, Presbyterianism, Methodism and Congregationalism. Suffice it to add that naturally the range of topics treated and of views expressed is equally broad. [George H. Doran Company, New York. 75 cents.

For Older Boys and Girls

The Pioneer Boys of the Mississippi, by Harrison Adams, marks the third step in the progress of the "Young Pioneer" series, and takes the young heroes from their Ohio home west through the wilderness to the banks of the Mississippi, an exciting journey beset with hardships and adventures of fascinating character. The book gives a good picture in readable form of the nature of real pioneering in the early days when Indians, food and shelter were serious problems with which to be reckoned. Those great pioneer favorites, Daniel Boone and Simon Kenton, alone will delight youthful readers. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $1.25.

The Little Cousin Series has two new additions. "Our Bulgarian Cousin," by Clara Vostrovsky Winlow, shows the interesting lives lived by these little-known people, the flower farms where they make attar of roses, the homes and schools, the work and games, the kind of clothes they wear and the ideas they have, using one small boy as the hero, who is typical of his Bulgarian brothers. "Our Little Austrian Cousin," by Florence E. Mendel, describes Austrian life and dips into Austrian history and folklore as well. It includes the Austrian version of Cinderella, which little Americans will find quite different from the tale they know so well. Both books are pleasantly informative in a story-telling fashion that will make their young readers absorb knowledge without conscious effort. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. 60 cents each.

Peggy Raymond's Vacation, by Harriet Lummis Smith, an addition to the "Friendly Terrace" series, is a delightfully refreshing girls' story, in which the young people are wholesome and natural. A group of them, with a dear old Aunt Abigail, not a bit like the conventional aunts, go off to a cottage in the real country for a summer vacation. Peggy is always on the alert for interesting things to do, so she begins by getting a nice old yellow hen and a setting of eggs, then she becomes interested in helping the fish boy recover from being a misanthrope and she teaches an ambitious girl some algebra, and makes so many other friendly relations among the neighbors roundabout that everyone regrets her leaving. None of the time is she the least bit priggish—just the nice kind of girl, jolly and helpful and reliable, that one likes to know and that it is good for other girls to read about. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $1.50.

The Blossom Shop, by Isla Mullins, a cross between an old juvenile and a young novel, describing the struggles of a young southern widow left with a little blind daughter and the old home. Her father-in-law, who had been displeased by his son's marriage, disinherited him, giving his large fortune to his already well-to-do sister, who at the time of the grandparents' deaths kept to the spirit of the will conscientiously, sending them only a trunk full of the grandmother's clothes, which Mrs. Grey scorned to open. She and her little girl gathered the cape jessamines which made the old home beautiful and sent them off to the city florists and gradually saved money for an operation for little Eugenie's blindness. Then one day the old house burned down, the old trunk got its hinges broken and they found a new will which gave all the inheritance back to the little girl and her mother. The story is pretty with a flowerlike atmosphere. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $1 net.

Miscellaneous

Conservation of School Children. This is a compilation of addresses and papers at a recent meeting of the American Academy of Medicine, which specializes on social hygiene. A considerable portion of the material is of technical medical and sociological interest, dealing with the proper care of defective and delinquent children. But there is a great deal which will directly concern conscientious fathers and mothers of normal children, who will find an abundance of suggestion for cooperation with the public schools in the intellectual and physical interests of their own boys and girls. [Dr. Charles McIntire, Easton, Pa.

The Tonsils and the Voice in Science, Surgery, Speech and Song, by Richard B. Faulkner, M. D. Dr. Faulkner has prepared what is here declared to be the first comprehensive monograph on the tonsils and their functions. In view of their frequent removal by surgeons, the subject is of general interest, while the authorities quoted will give the book professional validity. Dr. Faulkner's conclusions are not favorable to excision where it may be possibly avoided. [Presbyterian Book Store, Pittsburg.

The Emergency in China, by F. L. Hawks Pott. The latest publication in the "Forward Mission Study Courses," a handbook decidedly up to date, and written by a man well qualified for his task. This volume is published by the Presbyterian Department of Missionary Education, 156 5th avenue, New York.

Desert Gold, by Zane Grey. An undistinctive but more or less thrilling tale of love, prospecting and fighting on the Arizona-Mexico frontier. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.30 net.

MISSIONARY WORK

Immigration Near High-Water Mark

Intelligent interest in home missions always implies keen attention to the figures showing annual immigration into the United States, which indicates the growing weight of the problem of assimilating the immigrant population. The government makes up its annual report at the end of June each year, and has just announced that the total number of immigrants admitted to this country in the year ending June 30, 1913, was 1,197,892. Only once before in the history of the United States has this number been exceeded. That was in 1907, when immigration went to its high-water mark, 1,285,349. Five times now the number of entering immigrants has exceeded a million in a year—in 1905, 1906, 1907, 1910 and 1913.

The nationality which bulks largest in this tremendous movement of peoples is the Italian, of whom 274,000 arrived within the twelve months indicated. Their average for the last five years has been 180,000. Of this total 232,000 are classed as South Italians, showing that the North Italian immigration is still comparatively small. Poles have numbered 174,000, compared with 85,000 last year. The Hebrews, with increase of 21,000 over the year previous, are enumerated at 101,000, the third largest number. No less than 48,000 Bulgarians, Servians, Montenegrins and Greeks have come to America since June, 1912, but the number of previous immigrants returning to take part in war in their native lands has been so large that the net gain of these nationalities in this country for the year has amounted only to 25,000. The smallest proportion of returning travelers is among the Jews, of whom only 7,000 last year ventured back to Europe. The total number of immigrant aliens departing within the period of the report was 308,000, indicating that the net gain of 1913 is 890,000.

A peculiarity of this last year was the tremendous flood of the immigrant stream in the last three months—April, May and June. In June of 1913 the admissions were 176,000, whereas the year before only 92,000 came in in June. Should this ratio keep up, the record for 1914 would go far ahead of any other previous aggregate in immigration accounts. It seems that the steamship companies and other agents have widely disseminated through Europe the belief that the United States will shortly impose heavy restrictions on immigrants, and under this incitement many who have been thinking of migrating are constrained to hurry their preparations and come as early as possible. There is thus an accumulating stress on immigration which may be painfully felt by the American public during the next year, and this gives peculiar timeliness to the home mission campaign which will be interdenominationally pressed by the home mission boards this autumn, when "New Americans for a New America" will be the slogan.

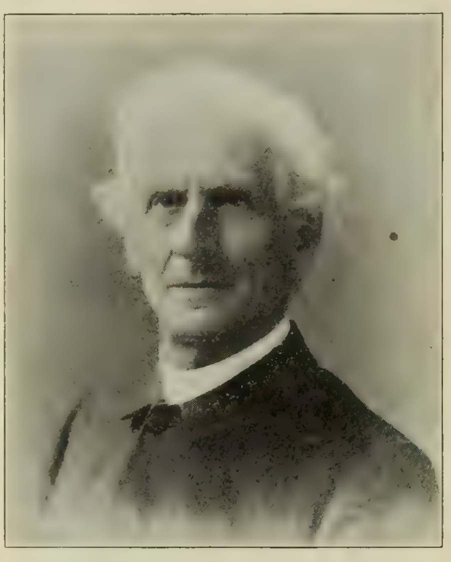
The Grand Old Man of Syria

In the not improbable event of another great anti-Christian uprising by the Moslems of Syria, the safest place in the city of Beirut would be the campus of the American college, whose ideals and achievements have won the love and confidence of all races and sects in that troublous land. There can be no doubt that, from the viewpoint of intellectual, moral and social uplift, the biggest thing in the Turkish empire is the Syrian Protestant College, and, during the more than half century of its history, the institution has been inseparably identified with the personality of Daniel Bliss—"Dan'el" he himself pronounces it.

In 1855 a leaky sailing vessel landed a cargo of rum and missionaries at Beirut. The rum was drunk up long ago; but one of the passengers, the tall, wiry Yankee who is the subject of this sketch, is still full of optimism and bubbling over with the joy of life. When I met him again in Beirut this summer, he told me, with quiet chuckles of enjoyment, how, shortly after he landed in Syria, one of the older missionaries remarked, "Dan'el Bliss isn't practical and his wife won't live a year in this climate." After nearly sixty years the beloved wife is still with him; and as for being practical—there stands the great university which he has built!

Others helped him from the beginning—wise and generous philanthropists like William E. Dodge, D. Stuart Dodge and Morris K. Jesup in America, the Duke of Argyle and the Earl of Shaftesbury in Great Britain—but 2,000 alumni scattered over the five continents will tell you that the Beirut college is first and foremost an enduring monument to the foresight and tact and self-sacrifice and patience and indomitable optimism of "the old doctor."

It was very small at first. A half century ago there were but few students gathered in a hired room. Today the faculty and administrative officers alone number almost a hundred, twenty imposing stone buildings rise above a magnificent campus of fifty acres which overlooks the Mediterranean, and nearly a thousand students in the seven schools of what is really a great university are studying in the English language. The institution is emphatically Christian, but it is as nonsectarian as Harvard or Columbia. More than a score of languages are spoken daily on its campus, and every religion and sect of western Asia, including Mohammedanism and Judaism, is represented in the student body, drawn chiefly from Persia, India, Greece and Egypt, as well as from all parts of the Turkish empire. And it is hardly an exaggeration to say that every student and graduate honors Daniel Bliss next only to God.



Daniel Bliss, D. D.

He is getting on in years now—he celebrated his ninetieth birthday Aug. 17—and a recent stoop has taken a fraction of an inch from his six feet of spare, hard bone and muscle. A decade ago he resigned the presidency of the college and, to his great delight, his son was elected in his place. "See what my boy is doing!" he exclaims, as he shows visitors the new buildings which are going up almost at the rate of one a year. So now the old doctor just walks about the campus which he loves, and from beneath his shock of thick white hair beams an irresistibly infectious enjoyment of this superlatively beautiful world.

Did I say that Dr. Bliss is old? Not he! He would indignantly deny the imputation. It is true that he has seen ninety years, but he recently expressed his intention to live to be a hundred. When he was a stalwart youth of four score I heard him remark: "Let the old fellows talk about the good old times if they want to. I believe that the world is getting better every day!" So it is—and it is very much the better for the life and works of Daniel Bliss.

Mexican Revolutionists Tax Missionaries

After the city of Zitacuaro was assaulted by Mexican revolutionists in the latter part of July the town was cut off from all outside communication for several days and there was great anxiety lest the Presbyterian missionaries in the place might have suffered seriously. Both telegraph line and railroad to Mexico City were destroyed. But anxiety was finally allayed by the arrival of a messenger, who reported that although the fierce street battle in which thirty men were killed occurred very close to the mission house, no one connected with the mission was injured. The missionaries were, however, forced to contribute 100 pesos to the revolutionary fund, and the insurgents besides ran off with two horses belonging to the station.

Chilean Students Ridicule Archbishop

Rev. and Mrs. C. M. Spining have just arrived from their home in Valparaiso, Chile, for a year's furlough in the United States. Mr. Spining's health is seriously impaired, but it is hoped that a year's rest will thoroughly restore him. The word which these missionaries bring from Chile reports an astonishing and even alarming decline in popular respect for the Roman Catholic Church, which is accustomed to boast of Chile as an exemplary Catholic country. The revolt is alarming because for the most part it has plunged into scornful disrespect toward all religion.

An incident occurring in Santiago just before Mr. and Mrs. Spining left Chile illustrates startlingly the truculent attitude of educated Chilean young men toward Romanism. The papal legate to Chile had been on a visit to Rome, and when his return was announced in Santiago a great host of students from the local university crowded the platform of the railway station to meet him. The haughty archbishop should have been sophisticated enough to suspect the purpose of the assemblage, but in his vanity he assumed too readily that the citizens of Santiago had been lonely in his absence and were very glad to welcome him home with warm greetings on his return. Accordingly, the papal ambassador stood up in the car and, leaning from the window, doffed his purple biretta to the crowd in a most ingratiating fashion. But he had miscalculated the purpose of the assemblage. So far from being very happy to do him honor, the students meant to make him all the trouble possible, and with a wild shout they grabbed the hat from the priest's hand and began to toss it about over their heads. When the legate descended from the car he was stoned and got through the crowd with great difficulty. After he had disappeared the students paraded the streets carrying the unhappy legate's biretta at the head of their procession, and repeated the performance for one or two days after, all the while shouting shameful ridicule at the Roman Church and all its people. It is said that finally the demonstration grew so ribald that the irreverent students even elevated the Host in mockery and brought it through the streets scoffing.

The Protestant missionaries were by no means happy over the spectacle, but they were more absolutely confirmed than ever of the necessity of their own presence and for the enlargement of their work in a country where the sanctions of religion, as represented by the only church which the mass of the people know, seem to have almost utterly lost their hold.

—When Rev. and Mrs. William M. Dager returned to their station at Elat, West Africa, from a year's furlough in the United States, they were received with enthusiastic affection by the people they are working among. And their welcome back continued for six months, as they went from place to place. With one accord the natives everywhere said, "Our eyes are satisfied."

Board Notes and Announcements

—The Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was led by Mrs. Howard B. McAfee, whose theme was the "adoration, resignation, consecration of Mary of Bethany, of whose words only one sentence is found, but there is no other woman named in the Bible whose picture is more clear than hers. As she sat at Jesus' feet and heard his word, her likeness is seen as if painted in a memorial window." Mrs. Coulter asked remembrance in prayer for the outgoing missionaries, and for those in the midst of disturbances in Mexico and China. Mrs. Bradley read a reply from Assembly's board as to a newspaper rumor that the Chinese government had again made the worship of Confucius compulsory in its schools, namely, that Nanking University men had heard of no such action. Letters were read from Miss Bernice Hunting of Syria, Mrs. Stead, M. D., of Persia and Mrs. E. C. Cort of Siam.

The Open Hearth

"How Big Was Alexander, Pa?"

In response to a request from Rev. James C. Butler, Miss Mary Glenn Ferris of Carthage, Ill., sends a copy of the once well known poem bearing the above title. It appears in Wilson Third Reader, credited to Rev. E. Jones. The Continent cannot give space to the verses, but a copy is being sent to Mr. Butler.

Rev. John G. Cooke of Baldwin, N. D., also promptly forwarded a copy of the poem.

The "One by One" Band

This band was founded by Thomas Hogben in 1888. Over 50,000 persons have been enrolled as members. It now has members working in eighty-two different countries. Its aim is to aid Christians in the work of bringing unsaved souls to Christ by definite prayer and personal effort. Every member is supplied with a "Throne of Grace Book" and the quarterly magazine. The attention of members is called to books and tracts that have influenced multitudes of Christians to enter upon the work of bringing men to Christ and have helped to make them wise to win souls.

The advisory council of the band, which includes such men as J. Wilbur Chapman, A. C. Dixon, F. B. Meyer and R. A. Torrey, "appeals to all Christians to consider the privilege and the duty of following the one by one plan for seeking and saving the lost." At a recent meeting the council adopted this resolution: "We gratefully acknowledge that during nearly twenty-five years this band has successfully stood for personal soul winning, and the unity of all believers in our Lord Jesus Christ; and that its practical value has been abundantly proved through the large number of testimonies given by its members, who have been made wise to win souls."

Dr. Torrey says: "The world will never be evangelized by public preaching, only by individual effort. The most effective method of soul winning is, beyond question, personal hand-to-hand work, leading men one by one to Christ."

I have been asked by the founder of the band, whose office is in London, to receive and forward to him the names of persons who desire to be enrolled as members, with membership fees. Those desiring to be enrolled may send me name and address and 15 cents in stamps as membership fee for the remainder of this year. If further information regarding the band and its work is desired, or literature and copies of the request for enrollment to be used in asking others to join the band, address the undersigned. J. A. Place of the Diaconate

It is frequently observed that the diaconate in Presbyterian churches is rather submerged, scarcely held in its rightful place of honor, nor performing the complete round of duties for which it is intended. I appeal for a thorough and emphasized ministry in temporal matters under the leading of local diaconates.

Service to men in broadest possible way has always been interpreted as the duty of Christians—service including spiritual and temporal ministry alike. Our Lord has emphasized the need of a temporal service. Individuals have felt the compelling of his commands. Why should not the church feel under obligation in temporal ministry, as well as individuals? Why is this not the church's business? Why should it be resigned to philanthropic and charity institutions? If the command rests upon Christians individually, why does it not rest upon them collectively?

Now how can this ministry be best performed? Individual effort is not to be unfavorably criticised; but, if there is additional or better result to be obtained through the activity of a committee in charge (such as the diaconate is), this body ought to be in action to greater extent. The disciples evidently favored this plan, since they counseled the choice of deacons, and our great and beloved Presbyterian Church has provided for the diaconate to care for the needs of men in these particulars.

But there still remains much decided underestimating both of the obligation to perform this ministry and of its value in gaining other victories for our Lord, as the following considerations will show.

1. Many churches have no diaconates at all. 2. Many diaconates are in delicate health and comparatively few are robust and active. 3. An inadequate idea as to this office and the duties of the officer is prevalent. 4. Very few diaconates include deaconesses despite the deacon's incapacity (by reason of his sex) to perform some ministries—which fact would have made the choice of deaconesses more frequent had a thorough ministry been performed. 5. Quite common testimony is to the effect that while elders are chosen with every regard to their fitness as guides and examples to men, deacons are chosen with first regard to their abilities in commercial life, their success in handling subscription papers and money raising —quite neglectful of consideration on this point that, as servants of the people in way of temporal ministry, they must be men of piety, grace and consecrated wisdom. 6. In many churches the diaconate is smothered, the eldership performing what temporal service is performed. 7. Diaconates frequently are reduced, debased to the position of subcommittees under the authority of the trusteeship with the task of providing for current expenses, and thus lowered from the sanctity and dignity of their ecclesiastical rank and separated from all relation to a temporal ministry. Reveries of a Bible Class Teacher

A warm morning, yet this, the principal thoroughfare of a big northwestern city, is thronged with worshipers moving toward a Gothic structure, with desolate side yard, the building spacious and symmetrical, the setting an abomination—symbolical, I thought, of the religious conditions prevailing in the ancient body which occupies it.

From between the overarching elms the Puritan church of a crouching, inelegant style of building—for architecture as a fine art has no place in it—comes in view. A small signboard informs Satan and the passers-by that the church will be closed from the middle of July until the first Sabbath in September, a truth not unlooked for as I marked the decadence of Congregational life during the past few years. The Sabbath evening service thinned out, then many devices for spiritual amusement were devised and exploited; yet death would not be driven from the church door; then just concerts, then vesper cantatas, but gradually the bones became drier and the army's roll on paper was its only evidence week day or Sunday until bottom conditions of life left but the hour on Sunday mornings, and even that "brook had dried up," the notice indicated. One hour for one day in the week was all that this representative of the consecrated church of the seventeenth century would give to God—and the same thing was true of a Methodist church a little farther down the same street.

The stream toward the great, grim, mediæval structure is at its height for 10 o'clock mass, but the only intruding worshiper at the Presbyterian church stands before a closed door, until I tell her that a class for Bible study will be held in the basement of the church. At the appointed hour ten persons, by actual count, meet, one being a stranger, while eight little children from the neighborhood not attendants at Sunday school help out in numbers, and a beautiful young woman with whom the teacher is barely acquainted gathers them in a group beside her and worship begins. Presuming on the necessities of the situation and the one member of session present being agreeable, formal public worhip is attempted and a lecture previously and fully announced is given, lasting three-quarters on an hour—praise, prayer and scriptural responses occupying the rest of the hour.

The teacher has studied his lesson carefully and has consulted eminent authority—reading and pondering for hours with prayer for light, warmth and force—and is very much in earnest. True, the audience is small, but it is exceedingly attentive, and the teacher feels that he has something to say, whether to few or many. In the course of his explication of Psalm 23 he deflects from the subject far enough and long

A Profit-Sharing Plan

I HAVE FINISHED MY COURSE · MINISTERIAL RELIEF AND SUSTENTATION · I HAVE KEPT THE FAITH · WITHERSPOON BUILDING · PHILADELPHIA · PA · I HAVE FOUGHT A GOOD FIGHT · PRESBYTERIAN

A Presbyterian business man hailed his minister on the street the other day. "Dominie," he said, "I made a nice little sum of money yesterday and you're such a good fellow—in fact, I don't know what I would do without you—I want you to share in my profits." He placed in his minister's hand a little roll of bills—$100 in all. Naturally the "Dominie" was pleased, and the business man, too.

In a day when many successful employers are sharing their profits with their employees, thus giving double incentive to efficient labor, why should not Prosperous Presbyterians share their profits with the servants of God, who serve them night and day?

There is a better way than hailing the minister on the street and giving him a roll of bills. It is helping him to provide an adequate pension for the day of his old age or for the dependency of his loved ones. Such a profit-sharing plan will mean a more efficient ministry, closer cooperation between the pulpit and the pew, and a new dignity to the King's business in the eyes of secular enterprises.

If you want to study the details of the Presbyterian Profit-Sharing plan, so that you may install it in your church, consult your "Dominie" or write,

Halfway between them a throng is hearing the gospel, epistle and psalm. That the rest of the devotions may be corrupt I may be willing to grant, but that God's word has some place of utterance, continuous and well attended, comforts me."

Church Membership in Scotland

On page 1071 of The Continent, issue of July 31, is the following concerning the city of Philadelphia—"giving the city the lead in Presbyterianism, in respect to numbers, of the cities of the world." This is quite true of the cities of America, and probably that was the intention of the writer. It is stated, in the paragraph referred to, that there are 108 Presbyterian churches and over twenty United and Reformed Presbyterian chuches, making at least 128 Presbyterian churches in Philadelphia. The membership of the 108 churches is given, in the paragraph referred to, as 54,330. The membership of the other more than twenty churches is not given.

The following figures are taken from the Scottish Church and University Almanac, 1912. The figures for the Scottish cities are by presbyteries, but to one who is somewhat familiar with the conditions it seems scarcely probable that a single one of the churches included in the calculation is as much as five miles outside the city limits. In Glasgow there are 29 Established churches and 9 United Free churches with more than a thousand members each. The 38 churches have a total membership of 49,193. In Edinburgh there are 29 Established churches and 8 United Free churches with more than a thousand members each. The 37 churches have a total membership of 57,377, or 3,047 in excess of the total membership of the 108 churches of Philadelphia as given above.

In Glasgow the 113 Established churches have 90,194 members. The 195 United Free churches have 109,661 members. In Edinburgh the 72 Established churches have 69,149 members and the 92 United Free churches have 59,713 members. The total membership of the two larger Presbyterian bodies of Glasgow is 199,855 and of Edinburgh 128,862. C. M. CANTRALL.

AN OLD NURSE
Persuaded Doctor to Drink Postum

An old faithful nurse and an experienced doctor are a pretty strong combination in favor of Postum, instead of tea and coffee.

The doctor said:

"I began to drink Postum five years ago on the advice of an old nurse.

"During an unusually busy winter, between coffee, tea and overwork, I became a victim of insomnia. In a month after beginning Postum, in place of tea and coffee, I could eat anything and sleep as soundly as a baby.

"In three months I had gained twenty pounds in weight. I now use Postum altogether instead of tea and coffee; even at bedtime, with a soda cracker or some other tasty buiscuit.

"Having a little tendency to diabetes, I used a small quantity of saccharine instead of sugar to sweeten with. I may add that today tea or coffee are never present in our house and very many patients, on my advice, have adopted Postum as their regular beverage.

"In conclusion, I can assure anyone that, as a refreshing, nourishing and nerve-strengthening beverage, there is nothing equal to Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Write for booklet, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms.

Regular (must be boiled).

Instant Postum doesn't require boiling, but is prepared instantly by stirring a level teaspoonful in an ordinary cup of hot water, which makes it right for most persons.

A big cup requires more, and some people who like strong things put in a heaping spoonful and temper it with a large supply of cream.

Experiment until you know the amount that pleases your palate and have it served that way in the future.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Ways of Working

Advertisements Sting to Activity Against Saloons

It cost H. W. Doremus of Montclair, N. J., $16.60 to arouse the church people of that suburb of New York to oppose the granting of saloon licenses by the local city council. Mr. Doremus is a member of the Doremus and Morse Advertising Agency of New York and understands how to use printers' ink to arouse public opinion. Previous to the meeting at which the Montclair council was scheduled to consider the granting of licenses for the present year he caused to be inserted in The Montclair Herald a series of twelve advertisements two to three columns in width by two to six inches in length.

One of the first of the advertisements read as follows:

> Wanted—Raw Material
> If liquor licenses are granted this year in Montclair—and there is every assurance they will be—a new supply of raw material must be furnished by our residents in the shape of boys, young men just from school and young business men. If 200 can be depended upon to start drinking beer and whisky it can be made a howling success. If you will assist,
> TELL THE MAYOR

This sarcastic advertisement seemed to take both the liquor people and church people by surprise. Friends of the saloonkeepers thought they were becoming too bold in vigorously announcing their need of customers and the mayor began to hear from both sides, especially after the appearance of the next advertisement.

> Two Hundred Fathers Wanted
> To teach their sons to drink beer and whisky during the coming year. You can depend on hearty cooperation of those engaged in the business. The liquor stores of Montclair are licensed by town authority and are as legitimate as the grocery, butcher shops, the Y. M. C. A. or the church. If you don't believe it
> ASK THE MAYOR
> Convenient locations, generous supply, courteous treatment. Help make the business a howling success.

According to Mr. Doremus, who gives an account of his unique advertising campaign in The Editor and Publisher, the mystery of the origin of the advertisements added to the excitement in the town. A week before the hearing took place a final volley of seven advertisements was fired, one on each page of the paper. "This was too much for staid old Montclair," writes Mr. Doremus, "and a meeting was called Sunday afternoon previous to the hearing in First Presbyterian church, which was attended by the best people of Montclair —twenty women and fifty men."

Just before this meeting an advertisement had appeared headed, "Freeze out the church crowd at the hearing Monday. Every friend of the saloon in Montclair should make his presence felt as never before. Get there early in large numbers and crowd the council room so that the meddlesome church crowd cannot get in."

Other advertisements announced that "a divided church in Montclair is the hope of the united saloon business." Another in large type urged the Christian citizens to patronize home industry and provide customers for the local saloons, as they contribute to town institutions through the license fees.

Another announcement proclaimed that the liquor business cannot live unless it is patronized by "your sons and daughters. If you don't agree, keep silent. If you will assist in making it a howling success, tell the mayor."

The seven saloons in the town all received new licenses despite the objections by a committee of the church members. One of the leading saloonkeepers, however, a politician who had always received his license by a vote of 11 to 0, found himself face to face with a tie vote, the suspense being broken by the mayor. According to Rev. L. S. Fulmer, pastor at Montclair, it is expected that a larger campaign will be developed this fall and winter directed against the saloon.

PRESBYTERIAN
SCHOOL
of Chicago
for Christian Workers
Organized in 1908 by the Board of Church Extension of the Presbytery
of Chicago

The demand for people who "know how to do it" is one of the conspicuous signs of the times.

Every trade and line of work is opening schools for training its workers.

It all means that we are awake to the need of people knowing how to do things and learning it in school instead of wasting time, and doing harm, experimenting on the public.

Shall we be less wise in our church affairs?

Don't you think it is time for us to undertake more seriously the training of church workers, other than ministers?

Directors of education, pastors' assistants, church secretaries, deaconesses, visitors—call them what you will or vary the duties as may be required—all should be trained in the School and come to the pastor ready for helpfulness.

That is part of the task of the Presbyterian Training School of Chicago. (Open this year to women only.)

If you are a prospective student, or if you want to help such a School, let us hear from you.

To Increase Sunday School Efficiency

In an effort to raise the standard of efficiency of the Sunday schools of Willamette Presbytery Rev. A. M. Williams, district educational superintendent of the Sunday School Board of the Pacific Northwest, has completed a survey of all the schools of presbytery. From the figures obtained it is shown that the standing of presbytery, according to the Westminster Standard, is 52 per cent. The percentage of enrollment present every Sunday in the schools is 64 and only twelve out of thirty schools reporting had additions to church membership from the school during the year. Most of the schools have active cradle roll and home departments, but the work of the organized classes is more or less haphazard. In the several churches in which pastors conduct communicant classes the gain to church membership from the schools has been largest. Missions are taught in some way in all of the schools.

There is a great diversity in the hymn book used. Promotion, an essential feature of the graded system, is not well provided for in many of the schools. Half of them hold general exercises with all departments present. An effort has been made to center attention on systematic education in the schools by sermons on Christian education, a conference of the workers and observance of various special days.

Pastors Support Warren Wilson's Work

At the summer school of theology in Auburn Seminary the students—all of them active pastors and many of them at work in country churches—were so deeply impressed with the practical and inspirational value of the work which Dr. Warren H. Wilson is doing in the country life department of the Home Board that they were moved to register a formal protest against attempts which are being made to destroy that important department of church work. The resolution which the summer school unanimously adopted said:

"Believing that the highest welfare of the kingdom of Christ is promoted by a scientific determination of the facts concerning the condition of the rural church, and also that we should have an inspiring and directing agency in this important field, we hereby express our ardent hope that our Board of Home Missions will be able to continue the valuable work being done by its department of church and country life."

Big Growth in a Century

Comparative figures of the growth of the Presbyterian church from 1813 to 1913 have been issued by Dr. W. H. Roberts, stated clerk of General Assembly. In 1813 there were in both North and South branches of the church 545 ministers, 50,000 communicants and 957 congregations, which contributed $2,095 to missionary and benevolent causes. One hundred years later there were in both churches 11,191 ministers, with 1,415,872 communicants in the Northern Church and 300,711 in the Southern Church. The total contributions for both branches of the church in 1913 were $9,078,549. The per capita contribution in 1813 to benevolent objects was 4 cents. A hundred years later the per capita contribution was about $5.25. Whereas the membership of both branches of the church in the hundred years has increased thirty-six times, the liberality of the members with regard to benevolent contributions increased 131 times.

Temperance Topics

Maurice E. McLoughlin, who is recognized as this country's greatest lawn tennis player, does not drink nor smoke, and expert observers attribute his successful playing in part to this fact. He brings to this country the Davis cup, which has been abroad for ten years.

Following a conference between the city attorney and representatives of nine breweries in Chisholm, Minn., an agreement was reached whereby the breweries will not sell beer in kegs to a list of undesirables furnished by the city council. This experiment is being made in an effort to solve the "blind pig" problem.

The Oregon W. C. T. U. has voiced its protest against women of the Pacific coast being typified by the dancing figure which adorns the posters which are being sent broadcast to advertise a festival to be held in San Francisco in October. Mrs. Ada Wallace Umruh, state president, says that the pictures insult womanhood.

The first municipal poster in the United States directed against alcoholism is that placed by authority of the mayor and park commissioners of Cambridge, Mass., in all parks and public buildings. This shows in large type that alcohol lowers vitality and opens the door to disease. It calls upon citizens to think what the indifference of voters costs the community by the continuance of permission to sell liquor.

In connection with a speech by Senator John D. Works of California in the United States senate after introducing a joint resolution proposing an amendment to prohibit the sale and manufacture of alcoholic liquors, a table was submitted showing that there are now in the United States 25,126,689 persons living in local option dry territory. In addition to this number must be added the population of nine prohibition states of over 14,000,000, which brings the total population in the United States in dry territory to 39,812,641. In spite of this fact liquor consumption seems to be increasing, although temperance advocates say that recent figures on total consumption include a large amount of liquor stored in bonded warehouses.

Study Rural Pastoral Needs

The western conference of the Y. M. C. A., held at Estes Park, Colo., included in its program a two weeks' course of study under the leadership of Rev. Warren H. Wilson. A group of ministers from five synods and thirteen presbyteries were delegates to this conference.

It gave them wider visions of service in their work in country parishes and revealed the need of a better equipment for the peculiar problems and exigencies that confront the country pastor. The necessity of a permanent pastorate to achieve the best possible results was continually magnified and the solution of the country problem, with its manifold phases, was clearly shown to center in a more efficient type of church life. A resolution in support of the department of church and country life of the Home Mission Board was unanimously adopted by the delegates.

Post-Conference Season at Northfield

Following the close of the Bible conference at Northfield on Aug. 17, some of the conference speakers remained for several days of lectures in the auditorium. Dr. Len G. Broughton of London spoke daily until the 22d. Dr. John Thomas of Liverpool, who is to preach twice on Sunday, the 24th, will extend a series of lectures on Mary Magdalene until Aug. 27. During September Dan Crawford, the famous missionary to Central Africa, and Melvin Trotter, the loved rescue mission worker of Grand Rapids, will be at Northfield, speaking to the students of Northfield Seminary and Mount Hermon school.

Trinity church, Montgomery, Ala., will erect a waiting station near the church building for the accommodation of members who use the car lines. The building will be erected upon city property.

News Notes from Various Fields

Minnesota

Wells, long vacant, is now supplied by Rev. Hugh Armstrong. The entire church building has been remodeled.

Rev. J. M. Bain, presbyterial missionary, has worked up twenty Sunday schools and five home department schools with the help of the pastors this season. Several of these are regularly supplied with a preaching service.

Two hundred Jewish and Presbyterian children joined in a recent outing at Lake Minnetonka. The picnic was held at the Jewish Welfare camp, where eighty children were taking a vacation. They were the hosts to Presbyterian children in two camps across the bay. Both Jew and gentile leaders assisted in entertaining the little folks.

The playground of Second church, Duluth, is to be lighted by electricity so that it may be used in the evening. Current and fixtures were donated by the local electric company. Rev. J. A. McGaughey, who has been pastor at Second church for two years, in a recent sermon mentioned the fact that of the thirty-eight funerals he had conducted in Duluth only two were for families belonging to his church.

Rev. L. Colyn of Alpha gives a half hour street service when all are invited to accompany him to the church for the regular evening service, which results in a packed house. Plans are drafted for an addition to the church building and a basement costing at least $1,500. A men's Bible class of twenty-five members has recently been organized. Rev. W. B. Augur, assisted by the Sunday school missionary, has added a rural district to his field, which he regularly supplies.

Washington

Rev. L. L. Sanders, who has been the supply for Montgomery Avenue U. P. church, Spokane, will engage in interdenominational evangelistic work this fall.

Rev. Thomas M. Wilson finds a widening field of usefulness in the growing lumbering and commercial center at Raymond. Funds for a new church are being subscribed.

H. L. Wilhelm, secretary of the Commercial Club of Sedro-Woolley, is one of the principal boosters in that part of the state. He is also a preacher and occupied the pulpit of First church, Bellingham, recently.

During the recent visit of Mrs. Caroline Bartlett Crane to the Pacific coast she spoke Aug. 3 in First church, Seattle, being introduced by the pastor, Dr. Mark A. Matthews. She also aroused women of Tacoma, Olympia and Bellingham to take a greater interest in civic affairs.

Rev. W. H. Jones finds much to encourage him among the quarries and sawmills of which Tenino is the center. The new stone church which is the hope of the congregation rises slowly. Before the winter comes they hope to leave the old building, in which they have worshiped for more than twenty years.

Illinois

Rev. E. L. Moore, pastor at Augusta, was recently married to Bessie McReynolds of Normal.

The corner stone of the new church at Oswego was laid Aug. 6. The pastor, Rev. J. T. Hood, had charge of the services.

The Christian Endeavor society of Upper Alton church will buy an organ to be used in the new gymnasium, where they will hold their meetings.

Central church, Rock Island, is experiencing deep disappointment in not being able to secure as permanent pastor Rev. Otis G. Dale, who has been serving them for the past three months. Mr. Dale went to this church temporarily in order to remove Mrs. Dale from the higher altitude of Colorado. The reuniting and rallying of the people has been most encouraging under his leadership. After hearing a series of lectures on "Church Efficiency" by Mr. Dale, the people desired to adopt many of the modern and advanced ideas of church organization and work. An almost complete reorganization of the business and financial plans of the congregation was effected. Mr. Dale expects to locate farther West at a lower altitude than Colorado.

Albion has just closed a union meeting conducted by Evangelist E. R. Dow. The tent was filled to overflowing many times. There were about eighty converts. The whole town was stirred and the surrounding country participated. Special days for business men, farmers, fraternities, young men, men only, women only, were features of the meeting.

A conference of country ministers will precede the country life conference which will be held in DeKalb the first week of September. The first session of the conference will be devoted to the present condition of country churches in Illinois, at which Rev. C. S. Adams of the department of church and country life will be the chief speaker. Rev. M. B. McNutt, Rev. J. N. McDonald of Maroa and Rev. Moses Breeze will be other speakers.

At a meeting of Springfield Presbytery last month John R. Lyons was examined and licensed and adjournment taken to Second church of Decatur July 25, when Mr. Lyons was ordained and with his wife recommended to the Board of Foreign Missions for appointment to the foreign field. Mr. and Mrs. Lyons will sail for China about the middle of September, representing the church in which the ordination service was held in its parish abroad.

Rock River Presbytery has decided to take up the work in the fast growing railroad section of Silvis, and a man is already in mind to undertake the arduous task. Silvis is the railroad center and yards of Rock Island and Moline. A canvass has already been made and general plans outlined. The work will be institutional and missionary and require a considerable outlay of home mission funds. No fewer than seventeen different nationalities are to be found here, and the presbytery feels it is its home "Madeconia" of work among foreigners.

A new church building, in every way worthy of its consecrated promoters, was recently completed at Bridgeport and was dedicated Aug. 3. The building, including a fine new pipe organ, cost $25,000. Within a few minutes the people contributed more than $1,000 in excess of the $6,000 asked for to pay all bills. Great credit is due the devoted pastor, Rev. H. R. Taylor, and his efficient building committee. The pipe organ was procured and paid for through the efforts of a committee of women headed by Mrs. Angie Seed King. This church has furnished two strong representatives in the foreign field—Dr. Mary Smith, who for many years has labored in Persia, and Mrs. Anna King Briggs, who has recently returned from the Laos country. It has recently given one of its daughters, Miss Helen Piper, to home mission work in the far West, and it has given to the gospel ministry the late F. F. Stoltz of Ottumwa, Iowa; Thomas Smith of Brighton, Mich.; O. A. Smith of Kokomo, Ind.; Charles Highfield of Belleville, Ill.; A. M. Buchanan of Olathe, Kan.; George W. King of Newark, N. J., and John S. Martin of Indianapolis, who preached the dedicatory sermon.

Idaho

It is expected that churches will be organized at Victor and Lamont this fall.

The following young men from McCormick Seminary are serving fields within the bounds of the synod: E. P. Linnell and W. R. Kruse are developing work in the Teton Basin, Arthur C. Evans is spending the summer at Auger Falls, Arcadia field, and De Forest N. Shotwell is serving a country field in Boise Presbytery.

Tennessee

Evangelist N. S. McClurkan and his wife, and C. E. Green, choir leader, and his wife, were brought to Dickson last month for a fifteen days' meeting. The services were held in a tent, whose seating capacity had to be enlarged three times and then many had to stand at each evening service. All the churches worked together to reach the unsaved. Each afternoon at 4 o'clock more than 150 persons met to pray for the meeting. There were 175 conversions and reclamations. At the afternoon services as many as eighty children met daily with Mrs. McClurkan and Mrs. Green. Dickson never had so great a revival before. Rev. J. W. McDaniel, pastor of First church, had charge of the arrangements.

California

Menlo Park and Easton churches, two fields near San Francisco that have not been showing activity for a long time, have been responding heartily this month to the efforts of Rev. M. E. Coen, who also is pastor of University Mound church.

The congregation of First church, Oakland, is once more under its own roof after nearly a year's absence in a rented building. On July 6 the people moved into their new $250,000 Gothic edifice, occupying the social hall with appropriate services. Robert F. Coyle, D. D., of Denver, a former pastor, preached the sermon at the invitation of the pastor,

Hot Weather Problems

They Are Easily Solved if One Knows What Kind of Food Is Best for the Family

There is always much discussion of the meat question in summer. In this age of progress and dietetic science, however, there would probably be no room for discussion as to what kind of meats should be eaten in hot weather. The average person who wants to keep in good health should confine his summer eating to fowl, fish, bacon and an occasional lamb chop for those who indulge in lively outdoor exercise, and these should be eaten but once a day—either for dinner or supper. For other meals a good, well cooked cereal, such as shredded wheat biscuit, combined with fresh fruits and some fresh green vegetables, is far more wholesome and nourishing. Shredded wheat biscuit supplies more digestible nutriment than meat, while the fresh fruit supplies a laxative property that is needed by most persons in summer. The combination is ideal for those who want to keep up to the top notch of energy at a time when the weather is most enervating.

Meat is classified by chemists as a "nitrogenous" food. Foods of this class impose the heaviest burden upon the digestive organs and are particularly burdensome to the liver and kidneys. They should be eaten sparingly even in winter and then only by persons whose daily employment calls for rather vigorous physical exercise. In summer red meat should be discarded entirely in order to keep the eliminating functions of the body in a healthful condition. This cannot be done when the digestive tract is burdened with heavy meats and other indigestible foods. One or two shredded wheat biscuits, eaten with milk or cream, will supply more strength-giving nutriment than meat; are much more easily digested and cost much less.

Many persons are so constituted that they are not able to eat starchy vegetables without much distress. By starchy vegetables we mean those that grow under the ground, such as potatoes, carrots and turnips. The starch is digested entirely in the intestines. Persons who suffer from intestinal indigestion should eat very sparingly of starchy foods, particularly in summer, when the vitality is low. In summer most persons, particularly those who are confined to offices and stores and who follow sedentary employments, will keep in better health by cutting red meats and starchy vegetables entirely out of their daily dietary and confining their meals to some well cooked whole wheat cereal like shredded wheat biscuit combined with the green vegetables that grow above the ground and with fresh fruits.

Probably the most wholesome and the most hygienic meal that could be prepared in summer is a combination of shredded wheat biscuits, fresh fruits and green vegetables, none of which requires any cooking or special preparation—indeed there is more real digestible nutriment in shredded wheat biscuits and fruit than there is in red meat or starchy vegetables—and one may live indefinitely on this kind of a combination served in many tempting varieties and forms without ever kindling a fire in the kitchen stove.

F. L. Goodspeed, D. D. This is the third building to be erected by this church for its worship. The main auditorium will not be completed for several months. The church has the largest membership in northern California.

The Congregationalists and Presbyterians of Redlands have united for the summer and gave each of their pastors six weeks' holiday.

Stanley A. Hunter delivered his stereopticon lecture on India Aug. 10 in Pomona church, Aug. 13 in Immanuel church, Los Angeles, and the following night in Boyle Heights church.

Sailing from San Francisco the middle of August for China were Rev. Arthur W. and Mrs. March of Hangchow College. Mrs. March is a daughter of Rev. Mr. Herriott of Oakland.

Rev. G. S. McCune of Syen Chun, Korea, whose name was mentioned in the Korean conspiracy case, has arrived home and has been staying for a few days with his brother-in-law, Rev. Lapsley McAfee, in Berkeley. With Mrs. McCune came a young Korean woman.

A recent reception was given in Stockton church in honor of Thomas Hanney, who for four years has been field secretary of the state Christian Endeavor society. He will leave soon with his bride for Central Africa to continue evangelistic services in which he has been markedly successful in California. He has visited a number of international Christian Endeavor conventions and is known widely. Before conversion he was a cowboy and gambler.

Paul Chovey, one of Dr. Arthur Ewing's students from Allahabad, India, addressed the prayer meeting of Calvary church, Riverside, July 24. He has been commissioned this summer to do evangelistic work among his countrymen on the Pacific coast. The Hindus there number 4,000. In the state university are seventeen students from India. Mr. Chovey is working his way through Syracuse University and is planning to return to India as a physician.

Ohio

Cincinnati Presbytery at its recent meeting discussed the rebuilding of Third church, burned several months ago. As funds appeared to be inadequate, the matter was referred to a committee.

Salem church is enjoying the use of a parish house. Last spring a house and lot adjoining the church was purchased and remodeled, furnishing rooms for the primary department of the Bible school, a ladies' parlor, rooms for the men's league and space for the Boy Scouts. At the same time arrangements are being made for improvements in the auditorium, probably costing, including the new property, $6,000 in all. Active and effective work is being done by the senior Christian Endeavor society. Rev. William L. Swan is in the eleventh year of his work in this field, whose membership has grown to 645.

Interesting replies to the question, "Why do not more men go to church?" were given recently by Rev. R. C. Stoll, First church, Alliance. One man referred to the unpleasant look given by the regular occupant of a pew he happened to be occupying. Another thought that ministers should help men more with today's problems rather than devoting their sermons to antediluvian times. A professional man said there was too much begging for money from the pulpit and too many generalities in sermons. Another man suggested that sermons should not be more than twenty or thirty minutes long. A summary of the replies showed hat industrial conditions were given as the xcuse for nonattendance by 90 per cent of the men; 60 per cent complained of uninteresting reaching and 50 per cent of lack of helpfulness in church.

Montana

Rev. G. W. Healy of Spokane, who is occupying Anaconda church for a month, was the astor there eighteen years ago.

Great Falls Grace church, which grew out of mission Sunday school, has been dedicated. Rev. George Edwards, long Sunday school missionary, is now the pastor of this church. W. I. Bailey has been secured to take up the unday school mission work in place of Mr. dwards.

Rev. G. W. Thomas, who has been located at Toston for some time, has been called to the new and growing town of Three Forks. Steps are being taken to erect a concrete church building. A small chapel has been in use for three or four years.

Rev. Mr. Ross, with the help of his church and other friends, has succeeded in building and dedicating free of debt a fine church edifice, well furnished and ready for service, at Hysham, a new town, where many discouragements had to be faced, met and overcome.

Wisconsin

As a welcome to the recently called pastor of Baraboo Congregational church the ministers of the Baptist, Presbyterian and M. E. churches led their people into the Congregational church on a recent Sunday evening and participated in the regular services.

Chippewa Presbytery at Lake Nebagamon church on July 30 received Carl E. Franze from Cayuga, N. Y., and ordained him. Mr. Franze is a graduate of Auburn Seminary and has entered work in northern Wisconsin, where his services are greatly needed. Rev. C. J. McConnell, the district superintendent at Superior, expresses an earnest wish for more workers of the same type.

Missouri

The chapel at Taylor Springs under the care of Hillsboro church is the only place for religious instruction in a town of upwards of 2,000 people. Until recently the mission had the services of no one except an occasional visit by the Sabbath school missionary, Professor Ernest A. Smith. On July 27 at a meeting in the chapel enough funds were raised, with the assistance of Hillsboro church, to secure the services of Rev. H. B. Douglass for a part of his time.

Michigan

Considerable interest was aroused in Battle Creek church recently by the announcement of "fur coat Sunday." The name applied to a garment to be presented to a missionary in Alaska rather than to the state of temperature of the church that day.

The chapel at Adrian, which has been undergoing extensive repairs, is nearly completed. Additional classrooms will take care of the growing Sunday school.

New York

Rev. Thomas W. Houston, known as the blind evangelist, has lately concluded a four weeks' evangelistic service under the auspices of the Interchurch Federation of Troy. A hundred meetings were conducted, some of them on the streets and at open air points, with noonday gatherings in factories. Following his Troy engagement Mr. Houston went to Philadelphia to hold tent meetings.

Pennsylvania

Aug. 10 Enon church opened for services after being remodeled. The improvements consist of a new low tower replacing the former spire, a new slate roof, six classrooms, new carpet, papering and painting. Services were held Friday night, Saturday afternoon and on the Sabbath. Rev. Charles Bell of Slippery Rock church preached. The largest communion service ever held in the church was on Sunday.

South Dakota

A lot was purchased at the recent townsite sale at Heaton for a Presbyterian church.

An effort is being made by Rev. Carroll D. Erskine of Sturgis to erect a $3,000 building, which shall serve as church and social center for the young people of the town, in which there are many saloons and poolrooms, but no reading room, library or gymnasium. The Christian forces of the town have exerted a strong influence in favor of Sabbath observance and obedience to law. Mr. Erskine was at one time a bootblack and newsboy in Binghamton, N. Y.

Kansas

A church to cost $40,000 has been started in Arkansas City. The M. E. church in the same town, and costing the same amount, was recently completed.

Dr. Ng Poon Chew, the well-known editor of a Chinese San Francisco paper, in a recent address at Kansas City predicted that in 100 years from now China will be supplying Christian missionaries to the United States.

At Liberal Rev. H. A. Holshouser, formerly of Dwight, has been pastor since Jan. 1. The membership has been increased 60 per cent and a manse costing more than $3,000 erected. Union evening services are being held on the public square this summer.

New Hampshire

Rev. Clarence A. Young of Roxbury, Rev. Lester M. Conrow of New Bedford, Rev. William W. Iliffe of Brookline and Professor J. Robb Harper of Chicago, together with their families, are spending the month of August on Gregg lake.

The week of Aug. 3 was filled with special services in honor of the 125th anniversary of the founding of the historic First church of Antrim and also the dedication of a beautiful new organ. Rev. Frank A. Arbuckle preached the sermon, which was of a historical nature. On Monday night C. E. Saunier of Boston gave an organ recital and Tuesday evening Mr. Arbuckle gave his stereopticon lecture on Japan. On Wednesday a reception was held at 5:30 and a banquet at 7 p. m. On Thursday the congregation and community gathered on Meeting House hill for a picnic and old-time "sing."

North Dakota

The corner stone of the new church at Raleigh was recently laid.
